(4) Pvt. Enic J. Valoren, United States Marines, was convicted of sleeping on post December 7, 1917. The sentence as approved was confinement for three months and forfeiture of two-thirds of his pay for a like period. Maj. Gen. Bundy was the reviewing authority.

(5) Pvt. Edward M. Wood was convicted of leaving his post before being regularly relieved on November 14, 1917. The sentence as approved provided for confinement for six months and forfeiture of two-thirds of his pay for a like period. Maj. Gen. Kernan reviewing authority.

(6) Pvt. James Sadestron was convicted of leaving his post before being regularly relieved on December 29. The sentence as approved was confinement for six months, with forfeiture of two-thirds of his pay for a like period. Maj. Gen. Bundy reviewing authority.

The records show with respect to some of the six cases listed above that the offenses were not committed in the front-line trenches. As to others, the records do not show where the offenses were committed.

3. In addition to the foregoing, the study in this office reveals a number of cases which have come in from France where men have been convicted of willful disobedience of orders under circumstances which do not distinguish them as to the locus of the offense from the cases of Fishback and Ledoyen, who were sentenced to death. The sentences in the cases referred to run from a few months to several years' confinement.

4. Permit me finally to observe, without reopening the case, that it will always be a matter of regret to me that the four cases upon which we are called upon to act were not well tried. The composition of the court in Ledoyen's case consisted of one colonel, one major, and four first lieutenants. The four first lieutenants could have had but little experience. The same court that tried Ledoyen tried Fishback. The court that tried Cook was composed of the same members, except a captain (doubtless of considerable experience) and a first lieutenant (presumably of little experience); and the same court that tried Cook tried Sebastian.

We have discussed the fact that each of the four defendants was a mere youth, and I am a little impressed by the fact that not one of them made any fight for his life. Each of the four men was defended by a second lieutenant, who made no special plea for them. I regret exceedingly that in each case the accused was allowed to make a plea of guilty. As counsel for them, I should have strongly advised that they plead not guilty and require the Government to maintain its case at every point.

It will not have escaped your notice that Gen. Pershing has no office of review in these cases. He seems to have required that these cases be sent to him for the purpose of putting on the record an expression of his view that all four men should be placed before a firing squad. I do not make this statement for the purpose of criticizing his action. Indeed, I sympathize with it. But it is fair, in the consideration of the action to be taken here, to bear in mind the fact that Gen. Pershing was not functioning as a reviewing officer with any official relation to the prosecution, but as commanding general anxious to maintain the discipline of his command.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF STAFF,
Washington, April 17, 1918.

Memorandum for the Secretary of War.

Herewith are the court-martial proceedings in four cases occurring in the American Expeditionary Forces in France, in which the sentence involves the death penalty. In two of these cases, namely, Pvts. Jeff Cook and Forest D. Sebastian, both of Company G, Sixteenth Infantry, the offense was sleeping on post. In the other two cases, namely, Pvts. Olon Ledoyen and Stanley G. Fishback, both of Company B, Sixteenth Infantry, the offense was willful disobedience of the lawful commands of their superior officers.

I have carefully examined the testimony in all these cases and have conferred with the Judge Advocate General concerning every phase of the legal questions involved. I am in complete agreement with the commanding general American Expeditionary Forces, in France, that the sentences should be confirmed and they should be duly executed.

Since my original interview with the Judge Advocate General, and under date of April 16, 1918, he has submitted to me a personal memorandum, herewith, in which without reopening the cases he invited my attention to cases of other men serving in the American Expeditionary Forces who were tried for similar offenses and whose sentences are not as severe as the four cases under consideration. The six cases enumerated in paragraph 2 of that memorandum refer to offenses which were not committed in the front-line trenches. The Judge Advocate General states that: "The records show with respect to some of the six cases listed above that the offenses were not committed in the front-line trenches. As to others the records do not show where the offenses were committed." I am able to state from my own personal knowledge that the reviewing authorities who are cited in the brief of the Judge Advocate General indicate that all these cases were either in training camps or in the line of communications. Maj. Gen. Kernan, who approved two of the cases, was at that time the commanding general of the line of communications or, as it is now called, the Service of Supply. Maj. Gen. Bundy at the periods indicated by the date of the offenses was in training camp. Brig. Gen. Coe, on October 31, 1917, commanded the Heavy Artillery training camp at Mailly. In none of these cases, therefore, was the death sentence an appropriate sentence.

Referring to paragraph 4 of this memorandum of the Judge Advocate General, I do not find that his statement, "I regret exceedingly that in each case the accused was allowed to make a plea of guilty," is a fact. The record shows that two of these men, namely, Pvt. Sebastian and Pvt. Cook, did plead not guilty, and in the case of the other two men, Pvts. Ledoyen and Fishback, although the accused pleaded guilty the court proceeded to take evidence in the cases in spite of that plea.

The other cases mentioned in paragraph 1 of his memorandum have not appeared before me, and I do not know what additional testimony was brought out in those cases which moved the court to acquittal, but I do not think in any case that the different action of other courts has any substantial bearing upon the cases at issue.

The American Expeditionary Forces is confronted by the most alert and dangerous foe known in the history of the world. The safety not only of the sentinel's company but of the entire command is absolutely dependent on the vigilant performance of his duties as a sentinel. The safety of that command depends in an equal measure upon the prompt and complete obedience of the different men to the lawful commands of their superior officers. There is no doubt but that the members of this court had had the necessity for the alert performance of the duties of a sentinel strongly impressed upon them at the immediate time of the commission of these offenses. Before daylight on the morning of November 3, 1917, the first attack by the Germans upon the American lines took place. A salient near Artois, which was occupied by Company F, of the Sixteenth Infantry, was raided by the Germans, who killed 3 of our men, wounded 11, and captured and carried off 11 more. The very next night, that is, the night of November 3-4, 1917, Pvt. Sebastian was found sleeping on his post, and on the night of the 5th Pvt. Cook was found sleeping on his post. Both of these men belonged to the regiment which had suffered in the German raid of the 2d-3d. This condition of affairs presented an absolute menace, not only to that portion of the line held by the American troops but to the French troops in the adjacent sectors.

With respect to the cases of the two men who willfully disobeyed orders, these are as flagrant cases as have ever come my notice, and are without excuses or extenuating circumstances.

I recommend that the sentences of the courts in these four cases be confirmed and executed.

EXHIBIT 125.

MAY 1, 1918.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I present you herewith the court-martial proceedings in four cases occurring in the American Expeditionary Forces in France, each of which involves the imposition of the death penalty by shooting to death with musketry.

These cases have attracted widespread public interest, and with the papers are numerous letters and petitions urging clemency, most of which are of that spontaneous kind which are stirred by the natural aversion to the death penalty which humane people feel. Many of them are from mothers of soldiers whose general anxiety for the welfare of their sons is increased by apprehension lest exhaustion or thoughtlessness may lead their boys to weaknesses like those involved in these cases, which the newspapers have described as trivial and involving no moral guilt, with the consequence that sons whose lives they are willing to forfeit in their country's defense may be ingloriously taken for disciplinary reasons in an excess of severity. Many of the letters are from serious and thoughtful men, who argue that these cases do not involve disloyalty or conscious wrongdoing, and that whatever may have been the necessities of military discipline at other times and in other armies, the progress of a humane and intelligent civilization among us has advanced us beyond the helpful exercise of so stern a discipline in our Army in the present war.

I examined these cases personally, and had reached a conclusion with regard to the advice which I am herein giving before I had seen any of the letters or criticisms.

The record discloses the fact that the divisional commander, the commander in chief, Gen. Pershing, the Chief of Staff, Gen. March, and the Judge Advocate General concur in recommending the execution of the penalties imposed. The Judge Advocate General limits his concurrence to the technical statement that the proceedings in the cases are regular, and expressing regret that a more adequate conduct of the defense of the several men concerned was not provided, concurs in the recommendation of Gen. Pershing. As I find myself reaching an entirely different conclusion, and disagreeing with the entire and authoritative military opinion in case, I beg leave to set out at some length the reasons which move me in the matter.

The cases must be divided into two classes, and I will deal first with the two young men convicted of sleeping while on duty, namely, Pvt. Jeff Cook and Pvt. Forest D. Sebastian, both of Company G, Sixteenth Infantry.

These cases are substantially identical in their facts. The accusations were laid under the eighty-sixth article of war, which reads: "Any sentinel who is found * * * sleeping upon his post * * * shall, if the offense be committed in time of war, suffer death or such other punishment as a court-martial may direct."

In both cases a corporal inspecting along a front-line trench found these young men standing in the proper military position, leaning against the trench, with their rifles lying on the parapet of the trench within easy reach of their hands. Each man had his head resting on his arm, and his arm resting on the parapet. The offenses were committed, in the Sebastian case on the night of November 3 and 4, and in the Cook case on or about the 5th of November. In both cases the testimony was exceedingly brief, and showed that the night was dark and cold, that the soldiers had their ponchos and other equipment on, and in one case it was a fair inference that the poncho was drawn over the ears and trench helmet in such a way as to make it difficult for the soldier to hear the approaching steps of the corporal. In each case the corporal laid his own rifle upon the parapet, and took that of the soldier, carrying it away with him, and instructed the other sentinel, the men being posted in this outpost duty in twos, to shake the soldier and tell him to report to the corporal for his gun. In each case the corporal shamed the soldier for his neglect of duty, and pointed out to him the fact that not only his own life but those of others were at stake, and that he should be more zealous and alert. In neither case does either the corporal or the fellow sentinel swear positively that the accused was asleep, and I confess that on all reasonable grounds, taking the circumstances into consideration, it seems to me entirely likely that both men were asleep; but it is important to note that in neither case had the accused stepped away from his proper military post to sit down or lie down; both being found standing at their post of duty in what is admitted to have been a correct military position, and if they were asleep their heads literally nodded over on to their arms without any intentional relaxation of attention to their duty so far as can be gathered from any of the surrounding circumstances.

These soldiers were both young. Sebastian enlisted into the Regular Army by volunteering on the 18th of April, 1917, having had no previous military experience, his age at that time being 19 years and 6 months. He was, therefore, slightly more than 20 at the time of the alleged offense. Cook enlisted on the 11th of May, 1917, without previous military experience, his age at that time being 18 years and 11 months. He was, therefore, at the time of the alleged offense, slightly under 20 years of age.

From the testimony it appears that both of these young men had been posted as sentinels doing what is called double sentry duty, going on duty at 4 p. m., and remaining on duty until 6 a. m., with relief at intervals by other sentinels during the night, but with no opportunity to sleep during the night because of there being no place where they could secure sleep. It further appeared that neither of them had slept during the day before after having spent the previous night on gas sentinel duty, although both had tried to sleep during the day preceding the night of the alleged offenses, but found it impossible because of the noise. In both cases the commanding officers of the soldiers who forwarded the charges and recommended trials by general courts-martial added to his indorsement as extenuating circumstances the youth and failure of the soldiers to take the necessary rest when off duty on the first occupation of trenches.

It is difficult to picture to the eye which has not seen it the situation in which these young soldiers were placed. In the month of November the section of France in which these soldiers were stationed was cold, wet, and uncomfortable in the extreme. No sort of shelter of any comfortable kind could be provided near the trenches, because it attracts enemy observation and fire. Throughout one long night they performed duty as gas sentinels; during the next day, when they perhaps ought to have sought more rest than they did seek, they found it difficult to secure any sleep because of the noise and discomfort of their surroundings. As a consequence, on the night of the alleged offenses they had reached the place at which exhausted nature apparently refused to go further, and without any intentional relaxation of vigilance on their parts they dozed in standing positions at their posts of duty.

I am quite aware of the gravity of this offense, and of the fact that the safety of others, perhaps the safety of an army and of a cause, may depend upon such disciplinary enforcement of this regulation as will prevent soldiers from sleeping on sentinel duty; and yet I can not believe that youths of so little military experience, placed for the first time under circumstances so exhausting, can be held to deserve the death penalty, nor can I believe that discipline of the death sentence ought to be imposed in cases which do not involve a bad heart, or so flagrant a disregard of the welfare of others, and of the obligation of a soldier as to be evidence of conscious disloyalty.

In both of these cases the reviewing judge advocate quotes with approval some observations of Gen. Upton, who in his work on military policy points out that action taken by President Lincoln in the early days of the Civil War, pardoning or commuting sentences in cases of death penalty led to the need of greater severity at a later period in the interests of discipline; but the cases which Gen. Upton had in mind were cases of desertion in the face of the enemy involving cowardice, and cases of substantially treasonable betrayal of the Nation, and I can see no persuasion in them as an example. Rather it would seem to indicate that the invocation of this opinion of Gen. Upton indicates a feeling on the part of the reviewing judge advocate that while these particular cases might not be deemed on their own merits to justify the death sentence, that, nevertheless, as a disciplinary example such action would be justified. I am not, of course, suggesting that any of the military officers who have reviewed these cases would be willing to sacrifice the lives of these soldiers even though innocent; but I do think that if these cases stood alone no one of the reviewing officers would have recommended the execution of these sentences; their recommendations being, in my judgment, soldierly and in accordance with the traditions of their profession, and based upon a very earnest desire on their part to save the safety of their commands, and the lives of other soldiers; but, nevertheless, to some extent influenced by the value of the discipline of the Army of the examples which their execution would afford.

I have not sought to examine the learning of this subject, and, therefore, have not prepared a history of the death penalty as a military punishment; but I think it fair to assume that it arose in times and under circumstances quite different from these, when men were impressed into armies to fight for causes in which they had little interest and of which they had little knowledge, and when their conduct was controlled without their consent by those who assumed to have more or less arbitrary power over them. Our Army, however, is the Army of a democratic Nation fighting for a cause which the people themselves understand and approve, and I had happy and abundant evidence when I was in France that the plain soldiers of our Expeditionary Forces are aware of the fact that they are really defending principles in which they have as direct an interest as anybody, principles which they understand, approve, and are willing to die for.

I venture, therefore, to believe that the President can with perfect safety to military discipline pardon these two young men; and I have prepared and attached hereto an order which, if it meets with your approval, will accomplish that purpose, and at the same time, I believe, upon its publication further stimulate the already fine spirit of our Army in France. Such an order as I have here drawn would be read by every soldier in France and in the United States, and coming from the Commander in Chief would be a challenge to the performance of duty, quite as stimulating as any disciplinary terror proceeding from the execution of these sentences. In the meantime public opinion in this country would, I believe, with practical unanimity approve such action on your part.

In the cases of Stanley G. Fishback andOLON Ledoyen the charges are substantially identical in that each of them is accused under the sixty-fourth article of war of having "willfully disobeyed any lawful command of his superior officer." The facts show that on the 3d day of January, 1918, these two young men in broad daylight in the theater of war, at a place back of the actual line, were directed to bring their equipment and fall in for drill. Each refused, whereupon they were warned by the lieutenant who gave the order not to persist in their refusal on the ground that grave consequences would ensue. They were not warned that the penalty of disobedience was death, but were advised earnestly to comply. Both persisted in their refusal. Each gave as his reason for refusing that he had been drilled extensively the day before, that they had gotten cold, the weather being extremely severe, and that they had not yet recovered from the effects of that exposure.

Both pled guilty at the trial.

It is perfectly obvious that this order ought to have been obeyed. It was a proper military order, and it seems to me inconceivable that such obstinate refusal on so trivial a matter could have been made with any consciousness that the death penalty was the alternative. Nevertheless the disobedience was willful, undisciplined, and inexcusable, and it ought to be punished with a suitable punishment.

The Judge Advocate General, in reviewing these cases, limits himself again to the technical correctness of the proceedings, but in a subsequent memorandum he called the attention of the Chief of Staff to the fact that four cases of sleeping on post arising in the same regiment at approximately the same time resulted in acquittal of the accused on substantially the same evidence as that recited in the Sebastian and Cook cases, above reviewed, and that in six cases similar offenses committed elsewhere in France had led to very moderate penalties. The Judge Advocate General says in this memorandum: "In addition to the foregoing the study in this office reveals a number of cases which have come in from France where men have been convicted of willful disobedience of orders under circumstances which do not distinguish them as to the locus of the offense from the cases of Fishback and Ledoyen, who were sentenced to death. The sentences in the cases referred to run from a few months to several years' confinement."

In other words, the Judge Advocate General, reviewing generally the state of discipline in the Army in France and the steps taken to enforce it, reaches the conclusion that up to the time of the trial of these cases the offenses of which these soldiers were convicted had been regarded as quite minor in their gravity. The Chief of Staff, in commenting upon this memorandum of the Judge Advocate General, is able from his own recollection to add that the willful disobedience cases lately tried in France did not concur in the actual theater of war, making at least that much of a distinction. But the case still remains one in which suddenly a new and severe attitude is taken without the record disclosing that any special order had been made notifying soldiers that the requirements of discipline would call upon courts-martial thereafter to resort to extreme penalties to restore discipline.

Both Ledoyen and Fishback are young. The record shows that Ledoyen enlisted on the 3d of February, 1917, without previous military experience, his age at that time being 18 years and 1 month. Fishback enlisted on the 17th of February, 1917, without previous military experience, his age being 19 years and 2 months. Each of them at the time of the commission of the alleged offenses was therefore less than 20 years of age.

The record in the Fishback case shows that there had been previous shortcomings on his part in the matter of obedience. That is to say, he had once failed to report for drill, for which he was required to forfeit 15 days' pay; a second time failed to report for drill, penalty not stated; and a third time failed to report for fatigue duty, for which he was sentenced to one month at hard labor and to forfeit two-thirds of his pay for two months. He seems, therefore, to have found it difficult to accommodate himself to the discipline of the life of a soldier, and his offense hereunder reviewed is aggravated by this previous record.

By a very extraordinary coincidence this record discloses the fact that these two soldiers were members of a company commanded by Capt. D. A. Henckes. It is from the captain of his company that the soldier most immediately learns discipline and obedience. The captain sets the example and inculcates the principles upon which the soldier is built. Now, this particular Capt. Henckes, although for many years an officer in the Regular Army, was himself so undisciplined and disloyal that when he was ordered to France with his command he sought to resign because he did not want to fight the Germans. Born in this country and for 20 years an officer in its Army, under sworn obligation to defend the United States against all her enemies, domestic and foreign, he still sought to resign; and when the resignation was not accepted, and he went to France, the commander in chief was obliged to return him to this country because of his improper attitude toward the military service and his country's cause in this war. He was thereupon court-martialed and is now serving a sentence of 25 years in the penitentiary for his lack of loyalty and lack of discipline.

I confess I do not see how any soldiers in his company could have been expected to learn the proper attitude toward the military service from such a commander. I do not suggest that the shortcomings of Capt. Henckes be made an excuse for their disobedience, but these mere youths can barely be put to death under these circumstances, and I therefore recommend that the sentence in each case be commuted to one involving penal servitude under circumstances which will enable them by confinement in the Disciplinary Barracks at Fort Leavenworth to acquire under better conditions a wholesomer attitude toward the duty of a soldier. Orders accompanying this letter are drawn for your approval which will carry out the recommendation here made.

In view of the fact that both Fishback and Ledoyen had been previously guilty of minor offenses, as disclosed by the record, the penalty suggested is three years' confinement.

Respectfully submitted.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I am in entire agreement with you about the cases of Pvts. Jeff Cook, Forest D. Sebastian, Stanley C. Fishback, and Olon Ledoyen, and have taken pleasure in signing the orders which you were kind enough to have drawn up for me.

In the foregoing case of Pvt. Forest D. Sebastian, Company G, Sixteenth Infantry, sentence is confirmed.

In view of the youth of Pvt. Sebastian, and the fact that his offense seems to have been wholly free from disloyalty or conscious disregard of his duty, I hereby grant him a full and unconditional pardon, and direct that he report to his company for further military duty.

The needs of discipline in the Army with propriety impose grave penalties upon those who imperil the safety of their fellows, and endanger their country's cause by lack of vigilance, or by infractions of rules in which safety has been found to rest. I am persuaded, however, that this young man will take the restored opportunity of his forfeited life as a challenge to devoted service for the future, and that the soldiers of the Army of the United States in France will realize too keenly the high character of the cause for which they are fighting, and the confidence which their country reposes in them to permit the possibility of further danger from any similar shortcoming.

Memorandum for Gen. Crowder:

I have talked over the phone with the pardon clerk in the Department of Justice. He sees no legal objection of any kind whatsoever to the method the President has here taken of granting these two soldiers a pardon. He says it is a legal pardon. He suggests, however, that a copy of the President's action should be sent to each of the soldiers and a statement obtained from them that they accept the pardon granted. The paper then to be returned to the War Department for filing in the office of The Adjutant General of the Army. It seems to me that the action of the soldiers in taking their release is sufficient to show by implication that they do accept the pardon. However, I suggest that when the order is printed the action suggested be taken by sending a copy of the printed order to each of the soldiers.

MARCH 20, 1918.

Gen. CROWDER: 1. I am now ready to start at any time on the proposed journey for the study of the Allies' war laws and administration. I think my departure should be hastened.

2. More time will be required than I first reckoned. A rough estimate is one week at Ottawa, three or four weeks at London, three or four weeks at Paris, two weeks in conference with our own authorities, military and civil. About 20 days will be consumed in ocean travel going and returning. I could leave for Ottawa almost immediately.

3. I have from time to time had conference with members of the various foreign missions here, whereby I am satisfied I better know what is needed, and how to get it. Maj. Innes, of the British Embassy, has been the soul of courtesy, very interested, and very helpful. With great kindness he has offered to place his chambers at the Inns at my disposal.

4. My information is that the volume and the character of the work, together with the difficulty of getting the services of a stenographer abroad, will absolutely necessitate my taking along a stenographer from this office. The volume of dictation, copying, and note taking will make the continuous services of a stenographer indispensable.

5. I am sure I do not exaggerate the benefits that will result from such a tour. There have been missions for everything else, but nothing has been done to acquaint us, especially, with the war laws and administration of the Allies. Indeed, it would be difficult to exaggerate the benefits. I am quite sure that the results of such a tour and study will be helpful to the Government, to the department, and to you, and that it will be especially beneficial and I hope creditable to you, to me, and to this office. I feel that this office, thus prepared, will thereby be enabled to exert greater influence in the department and outside of it.

MARCH 8, 1919.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I was very glad to receive your letter of March 1, calling upon me for a brief statement of the facts concerning the organization for and the practice of the administration of military justice during the war. I agree heartily with you that there has been no opportunity for our people to hear through the press more than reports of fragmentary and inflamed criticisms based on sensationalized allegations and that they are entitled to a statement of the case as it is recorded in and viewed by the department.

The circumstances that have most amazed me in my following of the press reports are that the public interest has been carried and sustained by a supposed controversy between myself and an officer of my department, Gen. Ansell, and yet that the exceedingly small margin of actual controversy is entirely lost to sight in a murk of supposed instances of harsh or unjust treatment of soldiers which bears little or no relation to Gen. Ansell's lack of concurrence with the views of the War Department. I think therefore that a clear statement of the organic basis of that difference of opinion will go far to clear the atmosphere and leave us in a position to discuss separately the allegations of harshness or injustice.

Gen. Ansell contends that there is a fault in the organic structure of the court-martial system, in the fact that after a man has been tried by court-martial, and the record of trial has been reviewed by the authority that appointed the court (usually a military officer of high rank) and by him finally approved and carried into execution, there is no further appellate body or officer who can review the appointing officer's review and modify, affirm, or reverse his action.

With this I agree and there is no controversy about it. I submitted and you approved in January, 1918, a draft of legislation vesting such a further appellate or reviewing power in the President. The draft was introduced and died in the Senate Military Committee, which no doubt considered it of less actual importance than other pressing business of the war. If this were the only alleged difference of opinion within the department, therefore it vanishes with this simple statement and it is difficult to perceive a cause for unusual interest.

The storm centers, however, about three briefs—two from Gen. Ansell and one from myself to you. Strange to say, those briefs were not addressed previously to the desirability of such a power of review. That is conceded. They were addressed solely to the question of whether that power had not actually been granted by section 1199, R. A., a law that had been on the statute books for 55 years with but a single attempt to deduce from it the grant of so broad a power in any officer of the Government. That single attempt was made in a desperate effort to obtain the release of a convicted soldier by habeas corpus. The precise question on which Gen. Ansell and I do not agree was carried into a circuit court of the United States and there decided once for all in a manner binding on all administrative officers sworn to execute the law as they find it. I shall not prolong this statement by discussion of that question. That any administrative officer would be justified in finding in the unequivocal language of a statute so old, against the reasoned judgment of a Federal court and the administrative practice of 55 years, a hidden meaning revolutionizing the entire system of military justice is simply preposterous. Gen. Ansell's argument was an eager, earnest plea for a forbidden short cut based on expediency rather than on reason. With the desirability of such an appellate power in the President you agreed and forthwith requested it of Congress, which alone could grant it. Countenance of a plan to play ducks and drakes with a statute of the United States you refused. The briefs are in the Congressional Record or in the reports of committee hearings and they may confidently be left to the reading of any fair-minded man—lawyer or layman. That thread of the story is at an end.

But if the controversy is not over the advisability of such an appellate power and not in a substantial sense in the famous briefs, where is it? It lies in this: First, that Gen. Ansell believes that the power when granted, should be vested in the Judge Advocate General and that a complete judicial system with faithful analogies to the organization and procedure of civil courts should be substituted for the present simple and direct system of Army discipline, while the department believes that the power should be vested in the President; that with such a grant of power the faults of the existing system will be completely removed with the exercise of those powers and with the improvements that have been instituted in the last two years.

These are the real issues and the only ones.

The case is one of technical ramifications and I am sorry that limitations of space will not carry to the American people the wealth of fact and argument to be found in the files of the department. Each of the points of controversy must be discussed briefly and without available technicality.

What is proposed is to carry the principles of the civil code and civil court principles of procedure into our military system. Appeal is made to the Anglo-Saxon conviction of the net desirability for the guarded procedure, the technicalities of indictment and pleading and the stays, delays, and rights of appeal, which characterize our criminal courts. The real effect of such a change has not been examined but it is, in fact, a divorcement of the power to control discipline from the power to command armies. Indeed an analogy has been suggested between an army and a government and it is urged that our governmental distinction and separation between the executive and judicial system must be carried into the Army and that no commanding officer should be permitted to appeal to the disciplinary measure of trial by court-martial without the concurrence of his law officer or judge advocate, who should be, and usually is, a man learned in the technicalities of civil practice. Thus if a division commander intrusted with a major part in the Argonne offensive had contumaciously declined to carry out his part of the general plan, he could not be brought to trial by Gen. Pershing unless the judge advocate of the American Expeditionary Forces concurred.

Our civil code is good. It protects our most sacred liberties, but gentlemen who contend that it should be substituted for our military code—which is also good—forget that the purposes of the two systems are diametrically opposed. The civil code is designed to encourage, permit, and protect the very widest limit of individual action consistent with the minimum necessities of organized government. The military code, and especially our military code, is designed to operate on men hurriedly drawn from the liberal operation of the civil code, and to concentrate their strength, their thought, their individual action on one common purpose, the purpose of victory.

The common purpose is the plan of action. The plan of action can not be, as we have heard it is in the Bolsheviki army, the debated sense of the Army. The plan of action is and must be the plan of the commander. Therefore individual liberty of action inconsistent with that common purpose must be restricted. The military code is designed to accomplish that purpose.

The truth is (and our people have lately seen it demonstrated in a thousand ways) that peace and war both demand sacrifices of individual liberty to a common purpose, but such sacrifices in war are infinitely greater in number and degree than they are in peace. The soldier from the day he dons his uniform must be prepared to sacrifice much of his old freedom of action, and indeed he swears to do so in his oath to obey the orders of his commander.

What is the essence of all this? It is, that for the purposes of peace we demand an intricate legal system, even at the cost of technicalities, delays, and abstruse rules of law—we demand the admirable system of checks and balances, that is illustrated by the divorce of our executive from our judicial system. We intrust ourselves to these devices rather than to the fairness and justice in the hearts of men. The very nature of war is such that men forget the sordid views that made those checks and balances necessary. They give the Nation, willingly and eagerly, their fortunes and their lives, and in such a time of patriotic exaltation, we willingly give over, and the peril is such that we must give over, this adherence to artificial safeguard of complex rules and trust our individual rights more and more to the principles of humanity, honor, and justice in the breasts of our fellow citizens who are offering their lives and fortunes, as we are offering ours, to the perpetuation of our institutions and for the common good. On this theory the soldier is remitted to the simple and direct procedure for the enforcement of discipline in the Army. His court has its inception in the old courts of chivalry and honor, and the essential principle remains. His conduct is taken before his comrades who determine whether it is the conduct of a soldier or no.

In this lies the difference between the systems for civil and military justice. The War Department naturally adheres to the latter system. It repels the thought of an army in the field with two commanders—one in charge of its discipline and one in charge of its strategical and tactical maneuver. The picture is, to the student of war or to the man with the slightest familiarity with things military, nothing less than ridiculous.

I should be willing to rest with this statement were it not that it has been said that without such a radical change as is proposed we have witnessed atrocities of injustice and that they are traceable to faults in the existing system of military justice. I have said that there is one such fault. That fault is imposed by a statute of the United States. I presented it to Congress for correction and it was not corrected. The fault lies not in the fault of a civil judicial system, but in the lack of a power to reverse, modify, or affirm the action of a military commander on the findings and sentence of a court-martial. I think we have disposed of the contention that the power should lie in the Judge Advocate General. It should lie in the President.

But what actual harm has resulted from this fault? I have covered the facts in my letter to you of February 13. I can not repeat them here. It is only the executed portion of a sentence that the present power of the President does not reach. In order that such power as he now has may reach every case of injustice, excessive sentence, and illegality appearing in a trial by general court-martial a mechanism has been created in the office of the Judge Advocate General that gives, I venture to say, a scrutiny more far-reaching and exacting than is possible under any civil system under the sun. I shall not repeat its description or its record as shown in my letter to you of February 13, but I shall content myself with an assertion that I stand upon its record and that its record is complete and open to the public.

That mechanism added to the power of final review in the President asked for over a year ago will make the system such that I am willing to stand or fall by it.

So much for the controversy that has been magnified in the press and on the floor of Congress—this statement would not be complete, however, without reference to the allegations that have shocked the Nation and in respect of which the Nation is entitled most of all to assurance. It is asserted and attempted to be established by example that the sentences of courts-martial during the war have been atrociously severe.

Let me say first of all that the criticism that they are severe is not a criticism of the system of military justice, it is not a criticism of my administration of that system. It is a criticism of the officers who imposed, for instance, sentences of death for sentinels convicted of sleeping on post, for soldiers wilfully and contumaciously refusing to obey the direct orders of their commanding officers, and for desertion in time of war, and it is a criticism of the Congress which authorized a death penalty, in plain statutory terms to be assessed on convictions for these offenses. I do not mean to say that if criticism in the connection is due I am immune. I am not. I agree with the statute, and shall defend it, but I am not responsible for it.

Considering the charges from the standpoint of the officers who assessed the sentences, let us see who they are. Are they military zealots—men ground in an iron and heartless system until the liberal views of civil practice are ironed out of their souls? They are not. They are men taken in a general dragnet through the Nation so lately that the civilian clothes they left behind them are not yet out of style. They come from every walk of life. There are 200,000 of them. They comprise a faithful cross section of our whole people and our national life.

What is this charge of severity by them? We have seen that it can not be an indictment of the system. It is simply a difference between the opinions of well-meaning and human critics far removed from the scene of the offenses punished and with only a partisan, inadequate and highly colored statement of that case to guide them, and the opinions of men who considered the facts under the solemn obligation of an oath to be honest, impartial, and fair, who lived in the environment of the offense and were steeped in the reasons making it grave, and who assessed the sentence in the performance of the highest civic duty of man—the defense of home and country.

These men can not merit the indictment and diatribe that has been heaped upon their action. As Burke has said, you can indict a few individuals but you can not indict a nation. These men are a portion of the Nation—the portion that has been dedicated to death if need be to save the Nation from destruction. Their expression and not that of men 3,000 miles from the field of action is certainly the voice of the Nation on the punishments that should be meted out to men who imperil its honor and its safety.

Why should the offenses by a soldier of sleeping on a post of the guard, desertion, disobedience of orders be punishable by death? Because cities and fortifications and armies have been lost through the drowsiness of sentinels; because armies have been disintegrated and nations humbled by desertion; because battles have been lost and peoples sold into captivity by the disobedience of soldiers.

I can not enter this discussion further. To us at home, in comfort and in present peace, it is next to impossible to reconcile the almost unanimous view of soldiers in the theater of war on the gravity of these and many other lesser offenses by their comrades. Therefore the execution of not one sentence of death for these things has been approved by me and not one such sentence has been executed. Also, as I showed you in my letter of February 13, heavy sentences have been reduced comprehensively and uniformly. But even with that said I can neither condemn the 100,000 officers who assessed sentences, nor the law of Congress, nor the system under that law that made them possible.

There, Mr. Secretary, are the main issues of principles. I shall discuss at this place neither individual cases nor minor principles that have been put in issue. They all come back to the essential bases that are here stated. I am willing at the proper time to take up either subject or any variation under either. I can defend them all to the satisfaction of any fair-minded citizen.

Hostile critics will undoubtedly assert that the observations I have submitted commit me to a support of excessive sentences, which of course is not true. I only speak the probable viewpoint of the officers who have assessed these sentences. But it may be said with entire accuracy that on the day the armistice was signed, November 11, 1918, no person was serving the sentence of a general court-martial who had on that date entered upon the execution of the excessive portion of his sentence. As you are aware, shortly after my resumption of full charge of the office of the Judge Advocate General, I recommended the convening of a board of clemency to undertake with the greatest expedition the adjustment of war-time punishments to peace-time standards and that an admonition was issued, upon my recommendation, to courts-martial and reviewing authorities, both at home and abroad, to conform, unless special reasons influenced them to a contrary course, to the limits of punishment observed in time of peace.

I come now, with the utmost reluctance to a few distasteful paragraphs of personal vindication. My motives and my actions have been attacked, even my veracity has been insinuated against, and I have been advertised as having hampered the efforts of Gen. Ansell. I have been set off against him as reactionary.

It has been said that the present military code is archaic. I merely say that I began what proved a tedious and heart-breaking task of years to obtain a complete revision of the old military code early in my service, personally conducted that task beginning with my appointment as Judge Advocate General and at the end of four annual disappointments obtained its complete revision in 1916.

During much of the time Gen. Ansell was one of the most promising and trusted officers in my office. During all the time that the code was in revision he never suggested to me nor, so far as I can learn, to anyone else any of the changes he is suggesting now. He participated in preparing the manual for courts-martial which was based upon the new code, but he advanced none of these new views.

Indeed, the first time that I was advised of such a view was in November, 1917, on the occasion of his presenting to you—not through me and entirely without consulting me—the first of the elaborate briefs about which so much has been made. It has been charged that, as a result of that brief an order designating him as Acting Judge Advocate General was revoked, and further that he was relieved from his duties of supervising the administration of military justice. Nothing could be further from the truth. He was never relieved from his duties supervising the administration of military justice except to take a trip to France, which he was eager to do, and this was considerably after the submission of the brief and after the revocation of the order appointing him Acting Judge Advocate General and relieving me of my functions. That order was killed before I knew anything about the brief. It had never been published. It had been obtained by him from the Chief of Staff without consulting you and without your knowledge, and it was revoked by you because it was contrary to your wishes.

Gen. Ansell asked me in a formal written memorandum to help him secure an order appointing him Acting Judge Advocate General in charge of my functions. I did not wish to be relieved, but did not wish to embarrass you. I therefore replied in writing that he could take the matter up directly with the Secretary of War in his own way. He did not take the matter up with the Secretary of War at all. He took it up with the Acting Chief of Staff with the remark that I concurred. Upon this showing the Chief of Staff marked the draft of an order that Gen. Ansell had prepared for suspended publication. By accident I learned of this order. This was before I had an intimation from any source of the preparation of the first brief, or any intimation that Gen. Ansell had reached a conclusion as to the desirability of an appellate power in the Judge Advocate General. I called your attention to the circumstance, and you directed that the order be not published.

While it is true that Gen. Ansell's attempt to secure an order giving him my functions as Judge Advocate General was concurrent with his preparation of a brief urging a revolution in the military system, and his circulation of a document of such grave consequence among every officer in my office without giving me the slightest information of his efforts, it is not true that I knew of the brief until after you directed the rescinding of the unpublished order appointing him Acting Judge Advocate General.

It is also true that from that time forth the feeling of trust and confidence that I had in Gen. Ansell was shaken and that you asked me to spend more of my time in the Judge Advocate General's office and less at the office of the Provost Marshal General, both of which offices were under my supervision and were my responsibility. It is not true, however, that I relieved Gen. Ansell of his duties in supervision of the administration of military justice, nor is it true that he was hampered in any reforms or improvements possible under the law as Congress gave it. Except that he was disappointed in his effort to secure a revisory power in the Judge Advocate General by binding, against the decision of a Federal court and the administrative practice of 55 years, such a power in the existing statute, nothing was done to decrease his responsibility for the administration of military justice or to hamper his freedom of action. That he did not feel himself so hampered is shown by his submission, without my knowledge, of General Order 84, 1919, enlarging the revisory powers of the Acting Judge Advocate General in France, so as to give him, by delegation, the very power which you had declined to deduce from 1199 Revised Statutes.

It is further true that the brief itself did not tend to increase my confidence in Gen. Ansell. A decision was referred to a statute, quoted only in part, which, when read in full, rendered the decision of no value to the proposal that was invoked to support. Dicta, in a compendium of judicial definition, concerning the word "review" were cited from a page upon which were found more pertinent definitions absolutely refuting his view, and no reference made to the more pertinent definition. It was urged from the vantage point of the heat of the Civil War records that the power which it was contended had been granted by the statute had been used during the Civil War and for a considerable period thereafter, when the most cursory review of the records was convincing that such was not the case. It was stated that the question had not been addressed by the Federal courts, when the most frequently consulted volume in the office disclosed that such was not the case and referred directly to the instance in which the question had been addressed and the contention overruled, and further the case was found pasted in our office file of the Federal Reporter. Finally, it was urged unequivocally that such a power resides in the British judge advocate general, when exactly the reverse is true, the actual point having been authoritatively decided in a point opinion of the attorney and solicitor general of Great Britain in 1873.

When it was remembered that this was in no sense a controversial brief, but a memorandum addressed to you by an officer who stood in the rôle of your legal advisor, and that it was intended to commit you to a course as revolutionary as any ever taken by an administrative officer, I think I may be justified in the feeling of caution that replaced my former implicit trust.

I think I can fairly say, however, that this feeling of caution did not disturb my relations with Gen. Ansell and was in no way permitted then, or at any time thereafter, to interfere with the full use of his conceded talents in the task to which he had been assigned.

Except for his absence of about 90 days in France (April-July) as senior officer in my office, he has had abundant opportunity—indeed, it was his duty—to introduce improvements in procedure and to remedy the harshness of individual cases; but, notwithstanding his present protestations, the fact is that he made but sparing use of these opportunities, having personally signed, for example, the documents refusing to recommend clemency in three of the cases recently cited on the floor of Congress as examples of excessively severe sentences.

Attacks on the existing system and the furor that has been designed to shake the confidence of the American people in the system of military justice find their genesis in an article published by the correspondent, Mr. Rowland Thomas, January 19, 1919, and in press reports of a speech made by Gen. Ansell in Chicago, January 26, 1919, near the date of my resumption of the duties of the office of Judge Advocate General. From that time forward the fire of criticism was fed by an agitation contained in newspaper articles too consistently connected and too instinctively based on distorted accounts of matter on record in the Judge Advocate General's Office to allay the thought that a bitterly partisan propaganda rooted in this office was being conducted by some one therein. I do not say, I do not wish to be taken as intimating, that it was Gen. Ansell, but I do say with the utmost confidence that I am correct, that the propaganda was being fed into the hands of the press by those seeking not a reformation of the code but the accomplishment of ulterior motives.

If it were difficult for an officer of my department to obtain a hearing with me or with the Secretary of War; if there was a single reason why any situation requiring legislation should not be presented to Congress with my approval if I concurred, frankly without it if I did not concur; if any attempt had ever been made by me to make my records difficult of access to any properly accredited person entitled to inspect them, then I could understand a recourse to the bitter and unusual course that has been followed in this instance. None of these hampering contingencies exists, and therefore I can not understand the course. When there might have been a fair hearing of an honest difference of opinion in any form yet addressed, there has been an attempt by furtive and demagogic methods to inflame a public opinion against the truth. No such attempt ever succeeded and I have no fear that it will succeed in this instance.

Memorandum for the Chief Military Justice Division.

1. I have heretofore advised you frequently and informally, and I take this occasion to advise you more formally, of certain views of mine which I believe to be worthy of consideration and perhaps observation by those who have to do with the administration of military justice; indeed, in my judgment, must be observed generally in the establishment, if that administration is to be what justice requires it to be and what thoughtful public opinion would like it to be. I advise you thus that my views may not be misunderstood and that they may furnish you with a general guide in the review of proceedings and constitute your authority for action in which you and others may not personally concur.

2. Courts-martial are courts, tribunals for the doing of justice, as much so as any tribunals in the land, and they must be fairly and impartially constituted and they must fairly and impartially function. Judicial fairness in the case of courts-martial should be tested not only by the letter of the Articles of War but by those principles established in our jurisprudence which are designed to secure fair and impartial trial and which are applicable to all hearings of a judicial character.

3. The former military view, which had received in this country considerable judicial support, was that courts-martial performed only executive functions, and passed in an administrative way upon the military aspect of the misconduct of one subject to military law. The legal view, now judicially established, is quite the opposite, and is that courts-martial have full and complete jurisdiction over the conduct of all who are subject to military jurisdiction, with full power to try them not only for military offenses but for crimes against the general public law. This should bring to us in the Army, and most especially to those of us more directly interested in military justice, new appreciations. Murder, for instance, tried before a court-martial, is none the less than murder tried before a civil court and jury, with none the less serious consequences for society and the accused, and should be tried with none the less thoroughness and fairness. Thoroughness and fairness of courts-martial should be determined with less inclination to regard courts-martial as tribunals sui generis, and with greater regard for those fundamental safeguards with which the law beneficently surrounds every person placed in jeopardy. Articles of war having to do with rights of the accused therefore should be construed, both with respect to what they provide and what they fail to provide, more and more in the light of, and in comparison with, those constitutional principles which touch the rights of an accused in a criminal prosecution. Those principles should apply to courts-martial, except where clearly inapplicable to the military system.

4. I wish to speak now more specifically and give the general views above enunciated concrete application:

(a) My views are in conflict with the view advanced at times in argument by members of the board of review, to the effect that in determining the principles of fairness and impartiality to be applied to test courts-martial those principles should be sought in the analogy of a Roman chancellor or judge. Courts-martial are criminal courts administering criminal law; they consist of from 5 to 13 members, and thus the very law of their constitution denies the analogy of the single trier of law and fact found in Roman jurisprudence, and clearly establishes on the other hand their analogy to the common-law court and jury for the trial of criminal offenses; it is in that analogy, therefore, that we must seek the principles by which the fairness and impartiality of courts-martial must be tested. Applying these principles to a case now in hand, they serve, in my judgment, to prohibit the successive trial by the same court of several accused charged with the same or similar offenses, involving the same transaction, state of facts, and evidence.

(b) I further disagree with the view that article 37, as it exists in the military code, was designed to have, or does have, the curative effect which the board of review seems to me at times to attribute to it. That article does not permit us to register a legal conclusion that there was substantial error committed, and then to overcome it with the personal conclusion of the guilt of the accused gathered out of the entire case. No revisory power and no appellate court should ever reverse or disapprove, except for prejudicial error. The substance of the article appears nowadays frequently in civil codes, in which position it was clearly predicated upon the evil found in the disposition of some appellate tribunals to reverse for meticulous and fanciful errors, and was, therefore, designed to correct a bad judicial habit appearing in some places. It can not be truthfully said that the Army was ever given to meticulous disapproval, or that there has ever been a tendency in the establishment to indulge too freely the power of disapproval. The contrary was quite true, in my judgment, and in this view I must think general public judgment concurs. This article, as it appears in the military code, is rather more of a grant or power than a limitation.

(c) In my judgment punishments awarded by courts-martial during this war are properly criticisable in general for their undue and inexplicable severity. Frequently they are such as to shock the conscience. Such punishments violate justice and serve no proper end. They invite and merit public reproach. We frequently have to confess that nobody expects such punishments to be served. Such a confession, while true, is an admission of the injustice of the punishments and is bound to bring courts-martial into disrepute.

I wish you would help me in determining the course which this office ought to take in making an effort to see that these unjust and severe penalties may be brought within the bounds of reason and justice.

5. The review of proceedings should be expeditious. The result should be made to turn upon substantial error, so tangible that we may have no great difficulty in discovering the principles touching it. To such, and not to inconsequential, error should our consideration be invited, and upon such should the case turn. With such error, however, justice will not permit us to compromise either by a resort to any assumed curative capacity of the Thirty-seventh article of war, or any other consideration.

6. My sense of applied law and justice, however, with which others of course may differ, requires me to enunciate these views clearly and unmistakably, and ask you to be governed by them until they may be superseded.

S. T. ANSELL,
Acting Judge Advocate General

EXHIBIT 138.

JANUARY 11, 1919.

Memorandum for the Secretary of War.

1. I have just finished reviewing the general court-martial cases from Camp Dix, under General Order 7, which have been presented to me to-day by the Chief of the Military Justice Division of this office. Those cases relate, of course, to that command alone, but I fear and have reason to believe that they evidence a situation that is much more general. This condition is directly due to a failure upon the part of the court-martial—a failure which in this case appears to be absolute—to appreciate the high character of their judicial functions and a similar failure upon the part of the convening and reviewing authority. Under the limitations of law, regulations, and orders, as construed in the War Department, this office was limited to advising the reviewing authority as to whether the record of trial was “legally sufficient to sustain the findings and sentence of the court,” and was not otherwise concerned with the quantum of punishment; this upon the view, of course, that the jurisdiction of the convening authority is final and beyond review. Nevertheless, impelled by the irresistible evidence found in the great number of unjust sentences passing through this office, I have presumed, with a hesitation which the delicacy of the situation demands, to invite the attention of convening authorities to the great severity of the punishment in those cases in which the punishment has appeared to be so disproportionate to the offense as to shock the conscience. In the light of what is transpiring at Dix, and doubtless elsewhere, I do not regard that such an administrative course, taken in specific instances, is sufficient to achieve and establish military justice.

2. The cases to which I now invite your attention have all come to me to-day as a part of the day's work. The officers who have handled them in this office and I are of one mind as to what they reveal and as to the necessity for the application of curative measures. I will give you a brief summary of them:

(a) In the case of Pvt. Sanford B. Every, Forty-ninth Company, Thirteenth Battalion, One hundred and fifty-third Depot Brigade, the accused was convicted simply of having a pass in his possession unlawfully. He was sentenced to be dishonorably discharged, with total forfeitures, and to be confined at hard labor for 10 years. The reviewing authority reduced the confinement to three. We consider this a trivial offense, and this office will doubtless go so far as to suggest to the convening authority that, inasmuch as this soldier has already been in confinement about two months, the entire sentence should be remitted.

(b) In the case of Pvt. Clayton H. Cooley, Thirteenth Company, Fourth Battalion, One hundred and fifty-third Depot Brigade, the accused was found guilty of absence without leave from July 29 to August 26, 1918, and from September 1 to September 8, 1918; failing to report for duty; escaping from confinement September 1, 1918. The court sentenced the accused to be dishonorably discharged the service, to forfeit all pay and allowances, and to be confined at hard labor for 40 years. The reviewing authority reduced the confinement to 10 years. The man has evidently been in confinement since last July. Even as so reduced the sentence is altogether too severe, and this office, in returning the record to the convening authority, will so comment upon it.

(c) In the case of Pvt. Charles Cino, Seventy-first Company, One hundred and fifty-third Depot Brigade, the accused was tried for disobeying an order “to take his rifle and go out to drill,” on November 1, 1918, and on escaping from confinement on November 4. He was sentenced to be dishonorably discharged the service and confined at hard labor for 30 years, which period of confinement the reviewing authority reduced to 20. In this case the accused claimed that he was sick, and doubtless he was suffering somewhat from venereal trouble. It may be that he was a maligner. In our judgment the sentence, even as reduced, was entirely too severe, and this office will so comment upon it to the convening authority.

(d) In the case of Pvt. Calvin N. Harper, Company A, Four hundred and thirteenth Reserve Labor Battalion, the accused was charged with desertion and convicted of absence without leave from the 12th day of August to the 13th day of November, 1918. He was sentenced to be dishonorably discharged, to forfeit all pay and allowances, and to be confined at hard labor for 20 years, which period of confinement the reviewing authority reduced to 10. The period of confinement, even as reduced, is unreasonably severe, and this office will comment upon it accordingly.

(e) In the case of Pvt. Salvatore Pastoria, Company Thirty-six, Ninth Training Battalion, One hundred and Fifty-third Depot Brigade, the accused was convicted of absence without leave from the 17th day of September until the 4th day of November, 1918. The accused testified, and in the absence of Government showing to the contrary I believe, that he went home to a young wife and a sick child, who was having considerable difficulty in keeping body and soul together. This, of course, does not justify, but it does extenuate. The court sentenced the accused to be dishonorably discharged and confined at hard labor for 15 years, which, however, was reduced by the reviewing authority to 3. I think it should be still further reduced, and shall so suggest to the convening authority.

(f) In the case of Pvt. Marion Williams, Fifty-eighth Company, Fifteenth Battalion, One hundred and fifty-third Depot Brigade, the accused was found guilty of disobeying the order of his lieutenant to "give me those cigarettes," behaving in an insubordinate manner to one of his sergeants by telling him to "Go to hell," and behaving himself with disrespect toward his lieutenant by saying to him that he, the accused, did not "give a God damn for anybody." Of course, there can be no question but that such conduct can not be tolerated, but, after all, it is of a kind that appears far more serious in a set of charges than in actuality. It was a company rumpus, which, in my judgment, might have been otherwise dealt with or, under the circumstances of its commission, merited no very long term of confinement. There was no evidence of previous misconduct. The court sentenced the accused to be dishonorably discharged from the service, to forfeit all pay and allowances due or to become due, and to be confined at hard labor for 40 years, which period of confinement the convening authority reduced to 10. This office will invite his attention to the severity of the sentence.

(g) In the case of Pvt. Lawrence W. Sims, Forty-ninth Company, Fourteenth Battalion, One hundred and fifty-third Depot Brigade, the accused was convicted of absence without leave from August 8, 1918, to November 20, 1918, and was sentenced to be dishonorably discharged and to be confined at hard labor for 25 years, which period of confinement the reviewing authority reduced to 10. Inasmuch as the record suggests that this case was something worse than absence without leave, this office does not feel justified in commenting upon it to the reviewing authority. However, the long term of imprisonment is cited to show the constitutional tendency of the court to award shockingly severe sentences.

(h) Another case has just been handed me, that of Pvt. Fred J. Muhlke, Medical Corps, Base Hospital, tried at Camp Grant for insubordinate conduct, which at worst could not merit confinement for more than a year or so in the disciplinary barracks. The court sentenced the accused to dishonorable discharge, total forfeiture, and confinement at hard labor for 50 years. The convening authority consumed some 10 pages in his review to show that such punishment was well merited.

3. If these were isolated examples they could be corrected, of course, without raising any serious question. But they are not. I am convinced that courts-martial and approving authorities are abusing their judicial powers in awarding and approving such sentences. Such sentences are extremely harsh and cruel. Surely no person having an ordinary sense of human justice can intend that any substantial proportion of such sentences shall ever be served. If they are awarded to be served they will bring disgrace by their shocking cruelty; if they are awarded as a sort of "bluff" they will bring sacred functions into disrepute both in and out of the Army. From every point of view they are a travesty upon justice.

4. If the courts are blameworthy the convening and reviewing authorities are no less so. They do not instruct their courts; they approve of such sentences and permit them to stand; they abuse their powers, and decline to apply their judgment and discretion to justice, by referring cases to courts-martial under arbitrary blanket rules and without individualization. I have just been furnished with an example of this found in a camp order which provides as follows:

"Absence without leave cases in which the offender has been absent more than 24 hours will be submitted to a special court. Cases of more than five days' absence will be submitted to a general court."

"In each instance where a case of absence without leave is referred to a court of superior jurisdiction, the court must realize (italics my own) that it has been referred to such court because it is considered that an inferior court, with limited powers of punishment, can not handle the case with sufficient severity."

I have known of no more flagrant abuse of judicial power than this—and I beg to remind you that such power is judicial. Please see Runkel v. United States (122 U. S., 543) and Grafton v. United States (206 U. S., 333). There are numerous other decisions to this effect. The Army—I believe I may be permitted to say the War Department also—fails to distinguish between functions which are judicial and functions which are purely administrative.

This order contains, in effect, and was intended to convey, the following directions:

(a) All absences without leave will be tried by court-martial.

(b) Those for more than one and less than five days will be punished by six months' confinement and six months' forfeiture of pay. (The limit of punishing power of a special court.)

(c) Those for more than five days will be tried by a general court and will be punished by dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and from six months' confinement up.

5. Again I have to advise you that these are not, in my judgment, isolated examples but are evidence of more general deficiencies in the administration of military justice which I have observed—at least I believe I have observed—during this war.

MY DEAR GEN. CROWDER: I inclose herewith memorandum submitted to me by Gen. Ansell. It would seem entirely clear that there ought to be some general plan for reviewing and modifying sentences of the kind illustrated by him, which have been imposed during the war and are characterized by severity which would not be the case in time of peace. To be sure, the offenses of which these men have been found guilty have a somewhat different color and gravity during the period of hostilities, but it goes without saying that a review of the sentences imposed during the last 20 months will disclose: First, very unequal degrees of punishment; and, second, perhaps generally a system of penalties which the ends of justice and discipline would not justify us in enforcing now that hostilities have ceased.

I am not able to gather from Gen. Ansell's memorandum whether he recommends action by general order on my part, addressed to all commanders, and imposing further limits upon the severity of sentences. I do not know what my powers in the premises are, but if I have the power to issue such an order it would seem that it ought to be immediately prepared and issued, so as to stop now any further accumulation of cases in which clemency would be necessary to prevent a harshness and severity which you and I both agree are unnecessary from any disciplinary point of view.

Cordially, yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

COMMANDING GENERAL SOUTHERN DEPARTMENT,
Fort Sam Houston, Tex.:

In view of the cessation of hostilities and the reestablishment of conditions approximately those of peace within the territorial limits of the United States, the propriety of observing limitations upon the punishing powers of court as established by Executive order of December 15, 1916, is obvious. Where, in exceptional cases, a court-martial adjudges, and reviewing authority approves, punishment in excess of the limits desired in said Executive order, the reasons for so doing will be made a matter of record. Trial by general court within the territorial limits stated will be ordered only where the punishment that might be imposed by a special or summary court or by the commanding officer under the provisions of the One hundred and fourth Article of War, would be under all the circumstances of the case clearly inadequate.

EXHIBIT 141.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL,
Washington, January 28, 1919.

(Office order.)

Under date of January 13, 1919, the Secretary of War, in returning a memorandum submitted to him by Acting Judge Advocate General of the Army, remarked as follows:

"It would seem entirely clear that there ought to be some general plan for reviewing and modifying sentences of the kind illustrated by him, which have been imposed during the war and are characterized by severity which would not be the case in time of peace. To be sure, the offenses of which these men have been found guilty have a somewhat different color and gravity during the period of hostilities, but it goes without saying that a review of the sentences imposed during the last 20 months will disclose, first, very unequal degrees of punishment; and, second, perhaps generally, a system of penalties which the ends of justice and discipline would not justify us in enforcing now that hostilities have ceased."

In response to this memorandum, the undersigned proposed, as a means of preventing any further accumulation of cases in which a clemency would be necessary to prevent harshness and severity which are unnecessary from the point of view of present disciplinary requirements, the issue of the following order:

"(1) In view of the cessation of hostilities and the reestablishment of conditions approximating those of peace both within and without the theater of war, the propriety of observing limitations upon the punishing power of courts-martial, as established by Executive order of December 15, 1916, is obvious. Where, in exceptional cases, a court-martial adjudges and a reviewing authority approves punishments in excess of the limits described in said Executive order the reasons for so doing will be made a matter of record.

"(2) Trial by general court-martial will be ordered only where the punishment that might be imposed by a special or summary court, or by a commanding officer under the provisions of the one hundred and fourth article of war, would be, under all the circumstances of the case, clearly inadequate."

This order was approved and has been promulgated. To meet the past situation the undersigned proposed that the Judge Advocate General's Office should classify sentences imposed, and proceed, under approved rules, to equalize punishment through recommendation to clemency, which was approved by the Secretary of War.

In order to comply with the directions of the Secretary of War for a review of sentences imposed for offenses committed during the war period, with a view not only to equalizing punishment but to adjust that punishment to present disciplinary requirements, a board, to consist of (1) Brig. Gen. Samuel T. Ansell, Judge Advocate General's Department; (2) Col. John H. Wigmore, judge advocate; (3) Maj. Stevens Heckscher, judge advocate, is appointed to undertake the work outlined by the Secretary of War and the submission of recommendations for clemency in order to accomplish the equalization of punishments and the adjustment of penalties to the present disciplinary requirements desired by him. The board will meet at the earliest practicable date and submit for approval a plan of procedure looking to a speedy prosecution and completion of the duty imposed.

Judge Advocate General.

PLAN FOR CARRYING OUT WORK BY CLEMENCY BOARD APPOINTED UNDER OFFICE ORDER OF JANUARY 28, 1910.

1. In all cases of general prisoners the records of general courts-martial for offenses committed since the beginning of the war, excepting the cases to be reported upon in accordance with this plan by the commandants of the Disciplinary Barracks and its branches, will be examined in the first instance by a force of clerks and examining officers in the office of the Judge Advocate General, and form hereto attached will be filled out in triplicate for each case by the clerk in charge, except items 27 and 41; item 27 will be filled in by the officer examining the record, and item 41 by the board.

2. The several commandants of the United States Disciplinary Barracks and its branches at Fort Leavenworth, Alcatraz, and Fort Jay, will make a report at the earliest practicable moment to the Judge Advocate General of the Army in the case of every prisoner confined under his charge for the conviction of an offense committed since the beginning of the war, which report will be upon said form hereto attached, which will be filled out, in triplicate, in each case except as to items 27 and 41; item 27 will be filled in by the examining officer in the office of the Judge Advocate General, and item 41 by the board.

3. When the form in any case shall have been completed in the office of the Judge Advocate General, except for item 41, it, in triplicate, together with the court-martial record in the case, will be immediately transmitted to the clerk assigned to service with the board and by him placed before the board. The clemency board will thereupon make its study of the case, enter its recommendation on the form under item 41, and place the form before the Judge Advocate General for signature or other action and for transmission to the Secretary of War. In case the board is not unanimous any disagreeing member may file a briefly expressed nonconcurring recommendation.

4. As soon as the clemency board has been provided with the necessary assistance it shall proceed to give consideration to the cases of the prisoners confined in the penitentiaries and also to the cases transmitted to the office by the commandants of the Disciplinary Barracks and its branches as nearly as possible in the order in which they are received. It is understood that said commandants will give precedence of consideration to cases as the cases may in their judgment merit it. It is believed, however, and so recommended, that said commandants should consider and transmit to this office cases in the following order of precedence: (a) Those in which, because of the present information of the commandant, he believes the prisoners should be immediately released; (b) cases of desertion in which the prisoners surrendered; (c) cases in which the offenses were committed within the first four months of the prisoners' first service in the Army of the United States.

5. It is believed that consideration of the cases of prisoners serving confinement outside of the United States must be deferred until after the examination of the cases of those serving sentences of confinement within the United States, since it is thought that the obtaining of the necessary information and the relationship of the offense to the theater of war are considerations which would concur in such postponement.

6. The personnel to assist the clemency board in this work must consist at the outset of not less than 7 officers and 10 clerks. It is not at all certain that this number of officers and clerks will be found to be sufficient. The importance of this task is such, and so much depends upon its expeditious performance.

that an inadequate commissioned clerical personnel is bound to embarrass if not render abortive the entire undertaking.

EXHIBIT 143.

JUDGE ADVOCATE'S OFFICE,

DEAR GENERAL: I am going to write you a letter about several things, and utter a cry for help. Divisions, as you know, have been arriving in great numbers, and several corps are now being organized. I have asked that Hunt be assigned as judge advocate of the Second Corps, and have named Taylor for the Fourth. I expect soon to recommend Brown for the Third, and have in mind Gullion for the Fifth, if he is not taken for general staff or line work, which I very much fear. I expect to recommend Winship for judge advocate of the First Army. The policy appears to be to impose as little administrative work on corps headquarters as possible. Corps judge advocates will perform about the same kinds of duties as division judge advocates, except that I want the corps judge advocate to supervise the division judge advocates in his corps. He will be in close touch with their offices, and should be able to give them any assistance in the way of advice needed. To that end, I hope to utilize the regular judge advocates as corps judge advocates as far as possible.

I have visited many of the divisions, in order to find out as much as I can about the disciplinary conditions, and to get the division judge advocates to do everything in their power to promote speedy trial and to adopt such policies as experience shows to be best in the American Expeditionary Forces. We must do everything we can to try our cases immediately here. We are necessarily delayed at times by the difficulty of getting the witnesses from the front-line trenches, and there has been delay in some divisions due to the difficulty of obtaining officers to sit on courts-martial, though this will, I hope, be avoided in the course of time by the appointment as members of convalescents and others fit for light duty. One division turned in 91 general court-martial records within a few days after its arrival here. The cases were tried two or three months before in the United States, and there appears to have been delay even in the trial of many of the cases. I have not been able, as yet, to find out the reasons for this very tardy administration of justice. I send you a copy of General Order 56, of these headquarters, which I drew in consultation with Hull and Winship. It is resulting in a very material reduction in the number of general court-martial trials. All capital cases must, under the law, still be tried by general court-martial, though many of them may be punished adequately with six months' hard labor or less. I may submit a recommendation before long that the special court be given jurisdiction in such cases, subject, of course, to its present limitations as to punishment.

I am endeavoring to have the policy adopted in each division of having the assistant division judge advocate prosecute practically all of the general court-martial cases. This is the only way we can have thorough trials and perfect records. We can not educate the line officers of this temporary force to observe all of the requirements of the law in the matter of trials, and I regard the presence of a skillful trial judge advocate, who shall be to the court what the law originally intended him to be, as necessary here. I think it will be practicable for the assistant division judge advocate to prosecute all, or nearly all, of the cases in his division.

There has been some difficulty in obtaining court reporters, especially in the Regular Army divisions, where stenographers are not so abundant as in the others. Of course, stenographers are in demand at the various regimental, brigade, and other headquarters, and objection is generally made by their commanders to their being taken for duty as a reporter. In a number of divisions, however, the cases are reported by one of the noncommissioned officers of the judge advocate's office, and this I hope to see done in all of the divisions before long. With both the trial judge advocate and the reporter in the division judge advocate's office, the whole matter is under one roof, and we should have few defects in our records. The three noncoms of a division office will be sufficient to dispose of the office work and report the general court trials.

The demands of the General Staff for every officer who has a knowledge of line or general-staff work are very insistent. As you know, I rescued McNeil, but have just lost Howze, and hardly hope to hold Gullion, and, of course, I may be compelled to give up a number of others.

Hull has an immense task as director of the renting, requisitions, and claims service, in addition to his duties as judge advocate of the S. O. S. I have done everything I could to supply him with the necessary personnel for the reason that the R. R. and C. Service is extremely important, must have the best of men, and must take charge of a vast amount of work at once.

Just at present my greatest need is for competent assistants in my own office. Due to the coming of so many troops, the work is piling up at a rapid rate, and I must have assistants who can relieve me from even seeing a great many of the papers that come into the office. At present, I have Boughton, McNeil, and Lieut. King, of the firm of King & King. King declines appointment in our corps for the reason that he is a machine-gun expert, is young and unmarried, and wants his chance, for a while at least, at the front. He must, therefore, be relieved before long, and I expect to send a cable requesting that you send me a good man from your Financial Division. McNeil is probably as capable an assistant as I can obtain from the regulars available here, though he has not had sufficient experience to relieve me of as much of the responsibility as I should like. I was away recently on a trip to London for more than a week, and shall probably have to go again early in July. More and more it becomes absolutely necessary to have a man to take charge of the office while I am gone, and to relieve me of a portion of the work when I am present. Numerous questions come in every day from the various sections of the General Staff, and other bureaus, and, of course, they must be disposed of here. We are too far from Washington to send questions up, especially in time of war when there must be prompt action. Mayes is the man, above all others, who would fit the requirements here, and I hope you may be able to send him very soon. The work in this office is of entirely different kind from that of the various tactical commands. It is more nearly like the work in your office, and it must be disposed of promptly. As the work grows, this office should be recruited from yours so far as the same may be done without serious detriment.

There have been a number of death sentences recently, requiring the confirmation of the President, but the cases were not of such a character as to justify, in Gen. Pershing's opinion and mine, the execution of the death sentence. In view of the time it would take to send the cases to Washington, we have sent the cases back to the courts for the imposition of a milder sentence. In one case, the court could not be reconvened, and, the evidence not being as conclusive as we thought it ought to be, the division commander, under our advice, disapproved the sentence. It would greatly facilitate the administration of justice, I think, if Gen. Pershing had the power to commute death sentences, not only in cases where he may confirm them, but in those cases requiring the President's confirmation. I have not suggested the matter to Gen. Pershing as yet, but expect to do so soon, and, if he agrees, a cable requesting the necessary legislation will probably be sent. I am aware of the view that has prevailed, that, under the Constitution, the President only may commute a sentence, but I believe that, under the power to make rules for the government of our land forces, Congress may vest military commanders with the power to commute sentences imposed by military courts, and that an exercise of this power by Congress would, undoubtedly, be held to be constitutional. An Army commander in the field should also have power to commute sentences of dismissal of an officer. Gen. Pershing is withholding confirmation of dismissals now and then, where it would be well if he had the power to commute to a forfeiture.

Very sincerely,

BETHEL.

EXHIBIT 144.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL,
Washington, September 5, 1918.

Memorandum for The Adjutant General.

Subject: In cable No. 1521, paragraph 5, subparagraph "b," Gen. Pershing says:

"It is highly desirable, in the interests of justice and the speedy administration of the same, that I be authorized to commute both the sentences which I am authorized to confirm and those which must be forwarded to the President for confirmation. I recommend proper legislation to that end."

1. The above dispatch is referred to this office for its recommendation. The proposition involves considerations deeper than those that may first appear. Commutation, unlike mitigation and remission—all of which are artful words—is a pardon granted on a condition subsequent that the offender undergo a punishment of a different nature. As such it involves the pardoning power of the President. It is established as a general proposition that the power of pardon belongs to the President alone, and that Congress is constitutionally incompetent to exercise it itself or to confer it upon another. Whether the power of pardon for military offenses, by reason of the expressed power of Congress to make rules and regulations for the government of the Army or any other power of Congress over the Army, is subject to a different rule and may be conferred by Congress upon subordinate military commanders, has never been before the courts or decided by any authority or, so far as I am aware, been the subject of serious discussion. I personally believe that Congress has such a power. But the theory of legislation and the practice of Government seems to be to the contrary. The question is, to say the least, full of doubt.

2. There is no evidence before this office, except that inferable from the request itself, that existing law imposes difficulty upon the maintenance of discipline. Under the Articles of War the commanding general of the American Expeditionary Forces, presumably as "commanding general of the Army in the field"—and in this respect he has the same powers as a territorial department or division commander—may confirm (a) death sentences in cases of murder, rape, mutiny, desertion, and spies, and (b) dismissal of officers below the grade of brigadier general. All other cases of death and dismissal must go to the President for confirmation. Such difficulty as the commanding general apprehends or may have encountered may be assumed to be this: He disagrees with the sentence of death or dismissal imposed by a court, which adheres, however, to its view and sentence in proceedings in revision or which can not be reconvened for reconsideration. In such cases, inasmuch as such sentences yield only to commutation and not to mitigation or remission, the alternative is to disapprove or to approve for the purpose of transmission to the President—as must be done in all cases expressly requiring the President's confirmation—in order that the President, if he is so disposed, may exercise the power of commutation. The elements involved in the assumed difficulty are (1) the time consumed in obtaining the action of the President, and (2) the inability of the commanding general to substitute his judgment for that of the President as to whether in such cases punishment other than death or dismissal should be imposed.

3. The time lost, in view of the gravity of the cases and their comparative infrequency, does not, to me at least, appear to be such as seriously to affect "the interests of justice and the speedy administration of the same," and besides, there is room for argument to the effect that a case which involves such serious considerations and in which the court, after considering the commanding general's views, firmly adheres to its sentence, might better, ~~on~~ <sup>in</sup> consideration of high public policy, be sent to the Commander in Chief of the Army, the supreme source of power in such cases. It is beside the point to say that commutation in such cases will always operate to the benefit of the offender; the public, the Army, has an interest in the punishment once ~~it~~ <sup>it is</sup> established, the protection of which is of no less importance than is the pardon for the accused.

4. The recommendation is, in its logical effect, a request for a very considerable enlargement of the power of confirmation in the commanding general. The power to commute is, rationally, a larger power than to confirm. It involves the power of confirmation of the sentence awarded and, in addition, the substitution therefor of a different punishment. Commutation necessarily involves confirmation though the converse is never true. The power of commutation has never been given to any military commander in any case, not even in those wherein he has full power to approve or disapprove, or to mitigate or remit the sentence awarded. Such a power affects and seriously modifies the judgment of the court as to the kind of punishment merited, on the one hand, and involves the constitutional powers of the Commander in Chief on the other. Whether such power has never been attempted to be taken out of the hands of the President and conferred upon another is due to congressional views of policy or of constitutional limitations, or both, is only a matter for speculation.

5. The power to commute is the power to say that the sentence awarded, when considered in the realm of pardon, ought not to be executed, but that another and different penalty should be. The power to decide that a sentence should not be executed necessarily involves the power to decide, in a proper case, that it should be executed. The authority to decide what should not be done may also decide what should be done. The same judgment and discretion are involved in both instances. Therefore, the power sought by the commanding general could not logically be limited simply to commutation or confirmation for the purpose of commutation. The judgment to determine that commutation should be had, should be equally competent to determine, when convinced of the justice and advisability of that course, that commutation should not be had and that the sentence awarded should be executed.

6. The existing statute, in this respect at least, deals with fundamental principles which do not undergo modification with every change of circumstance; it is old, has stood for a long time substantially unmodified, and in the absence of a considerable showing of its lack of wisdom or workability, is entitled to deference. It pretends to discriminate as to the power of confirmation of death and dismissal sentences, and in the absence of evidence must be assumed to do so intelligently. It should be changed, if in the respect sought it can be changed, only upon thorough consideration and in the light of conclusive experience.

7. I have difficulty to find logical limitations in this request. In the light of what I have said, if this particular commanding general should have the power to commute the sentences of death and dismissal which under existing law fall within the President's power of confirmation, for even stronger reasons, of course, should he have the same power of commutation in those cases of death and dismissal falling within his own power of confirmation; and if he should have the power of commutation in such serious cases as death and dismissal, it might be well said that he should have the same power in all cases falling within his power to confirm or to approve or disapprove. The request leads logically at least, to the consideration whether any convening authority with the power to approve or disapprove a sentence, should not, when his sound judgment and discretion dictate such a course, have the power to resort to commutation. Of course, the particular sentences under discussion—that is, death and dismissal—may be thought to be distinguishable from other sentences, in that they can not be mitigated, except by way of commutation. But even here the policy of the law has established a single penalty to be awarded, and it can be departed from only upon considerations equally high with those that justify departure in the less serious and ordinary cases. Then, again, I find difficulty in limiting the power to this particular commanding general. I see no circumstance surrounding him that would justify conferring upon him such a power, that would not be equally justified in reposing a like power in any convening authority similarly situated with respect to the seat of government, as, for instance, the commanding general of the Siberian Expeditionary Forces, in which case much more time would be consumed in the transmission of such proceedings to the President.

8. The power here sought concededly involves and derogates from the power established solely in the Commander in Chief of the Army by existing law, if not, indeed, by the Constitution. It is a matter, therefore, of such importance as to require consideration by the highest authority, and I wish my views understood with deference to that fact. Inasmuch as I have no evidence of the necessity or advisability for such enlargement of the powers of the commanding general in question, and because of the other considerations heretofore mentioned, for the present at least, I can not concur in the request.

9. This office is not called upon to draft the proposed legislation. If legislation should be drafted, I take the liberty to suggest the advisability of so drafting it as to confer this power upon such commanding generals in the field as the President may himself designate.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF STAFF,
Washington, September 19, 1918.

Memorandum for the Chief of Staff.

Subject: Amendment of the Articles of War with reference to power to commute sentences.

1. Herewith is an opinion of the Acting Judge Advocate General based upon Gen. Pershing's cable No. 1521, paragraph 5, subparagraph (b). The cable in question reads as follows:

"It is highly desirable, in the interests of justice and the speedy administration of the same, that I be authorized to commute both the sentences which I am authorized to confirm, and those which must be forwarded to the President for confirmation. I recommend proper legislation to that end."

The Judge Advocate General in his opinion argues to the following conclusion:

"The power here sought concededly involves and derogates from the power established solely in the Commander in Chief of the Army by existing law, if not, indeed, by the Constitution. It is a matter, therefore, of such importance as to require consideration by the highest authority, and I wish my views understood with deference to that fact. Inasmuch as I have no evidence of the necessity or advisability for such enlargement of the powers of the commanding general in question, and because of the other considerations heretofore mentioned, for the present at least, I can not concur in the request."

2. In order to understand clearly the situation here presented it is necessary to set out and have before us the provisions of existing law with reference to this matter.

The forty-sixth article of war provides:

"No sentence of a court-martial shall be carried into execution until the same shall have been approved by the officer appointing the court, or by the officer commanding for the time being."

The power to approve the sentence of a court-martial, as required by the forty-sixth article of war, is by the forty-seventh article made to include:

"(b) The power to approve or disapprove the whole or any part of the sentence."

The forty-eighth article of war deals with the confirmation of sentences of general courts-martial. Its effect, in part, is to confer on the commanding general of an army in the field and the commanding general of any territorial department or division the power to confirm sentences of death awarded in the "cases of persons convicted in time of war, of murder, rape, mutiny, desertion, or as spies." It also empowers the same officers in time of war to confirm a sentence of dismissal of any officer below the grade of brigadier general.

Under the forty-ninth article of war the power of confirmation conferred by the forty-eighth article of war is made to include:

"(a) * * * *

(b) The power to confirm or disapprove the whole or any part of the sentence."

The fiftieth article of war deals with the mitigation or remission of sentences. That article reads as follows:

"ART. 50. Mitigation or remission of sentences.—The power to order the execution of the sentence adjudged by a court-martial shall be held to include, inter alia, the power to mitigate or remit the whole or any part of the sentence, but no sentence of dismissal of an officer and no sentence of death shall be mitigated or remitted by any authority inferior to the President.

Any unexecuted portion of a sentence adjudged by a court-martial may be mitigated or remitted by the military authority competent to appoint, for the command, exclusive of penitentiaries and the United States Disciplinary Barracks, in which the person under sentence is held, a court of the kind that imposed the sentence, and the same power may be exercised by superior military authority; but no sentence extending to the dismissal of an officer or loss of files, no sentence of death, and no sentence approved or confirmed by the President shall be remitted or mitigated by any other authority.

The power of remission and mitigation shall extend to all uncollected forfeitures adjudged by sentence of a court-martial."

The fifty-first article of war deals with the suspension of sentence of dismissal or death. It provides that:

"The authority competent to order the execution of a sentence of dismissal of an officer or a sentence of death may suspend such sentence until the pleasure of the President be known, and in case of such suspension a copy of the order of suspension, together with a copy of the record of trial shall immediately be transmitted to the President."

The fifty-second article of war as amended by the act of July 9, 1918 (Public 193, 65th Congress), is as follows:

"ART. 52. Suspension of sentences.—The authority competent to order the execution of the sentence of a court-martial may, at the time of the approval of such sentence, suspend the execution, in whole or in part, of any such sentence as does not extend to death, and may restore the person under sentence to duty during such suspension. A sentence, or any part thereof, which has been so suspended may be remitted, in whole or in part, except in cases of persons confined in the United States Disciplinary Barracks or its branches, by the officer who suspended the same, by his successor in office, or by any officer exercising appropriate court-martial jurisdiction over the command in which the person under sentence may be serving at the time, and, subject to the foregoing exceptions the same authority may vacate the order of suspension at any time and order the execution of the sentence or the suspended part thereof in so far as the same shall not have been previously remitted. The death or honorable discharge of a person under suspended sentence shall operate as a complete remission of any unexecuted or unremitted part of such sentence."

3. It will be observed that the word "commute" or the word "commutation" is not used in this or any other article of war. It will be observed, moreover, that the fiftieth article of war speaks of the "mitigation" or "remission" of sentences of death or of dismissal of officers. Inasmuch, however, as the mitigation of either of these sentences requires a substitution of some other and distinct form of punishment, "mitigation" in such a case becomes in fact the "commutation" discussed in the opinion of the Acting Judge Advocate General.

Considering the articles of war as they now stand, the following limitations and inconsistencies may be pointed out:

Under the forty-eighth article of war the commanding general of an army in the field or the commanding general of a territorial department or territorial division may, in time of war, execute a sentence of dismissal of an officer below the grade of brigadier general, or a sentence of death in cases of persons convicted in time of war, of murder, rape, mutiny, desertion, or as spies, but he can not remit or mitigate these sentences. In other words, he may exercise the greater power but is denied the lesser.

No sound reason can be advanced why an officer who is given power to approve and carry into effect a sentence of death or of dismissal of an officer, without reference to higher authority, should not be given the lesser power of commuting such a sentence to one of lower degree.

Again, as the articles now stand, the commanding general of an army in the field or of a territorial department or division may, in a particular case, believe that a sentence of death or of dismissal of an officer is clearly excessive, but may believe that the accused has been legally convicted and that he deserves some lesser punishment. Ordinarily, he may refer the case back to the court-martial for a reconsideration of its sentence and may thus succeed in obtaining a sentence which he can, in good conscience, approve and execute, or mitigate or remit. In cases, however, where the court adheres to its original sentence, as well as in those where, owing to the exigencies of the service, it can not be reconvened, the commanding general is placed in the position of being forced to disapprove the sentence of the court where he believes a complete disapproval is not warranted, or to approve the sentence as pronounced by the court, even though he may be very much opposed to it in fact, and incur the risk that the President will not concur in his recommendation for mitigation. Should the President, notwithstanding the recommendation for mitigation, carry into execution the original sentence imposed by the court-martial, the commanding general is placed in the situation of having made it possible, by his formal approval (required by the forty-sixth article of war) of a sentence which he does not approve in fact, for the President to direct that the same be carried into execution.

It does not meet this situation to suggest that the President almost invariably follows the recommendation of the commanding general who makes it. If he does, much unnecessary paper work and administrative action are imposed on the department; and the commanding general, in so far as such cases are concerned, is reduced to a mere automaton. What good reason can be assigned why he should not directly exercise the power of mitigation without reference to the President?

Again, under the fiftieth article of war, as it now stands, no sentence of dismissal of an officer may be remitted or mitigated by any authority inferior to the President. Under the fifty-second article of war, however, as recently amended, the authority competent to order the execution of such a sentence may at the time of approval suspend the execution thereof, and having suspended it he may later remit it. He may thus do indirectly under the fifty-second article of war what he can not do directly under the fiftieth. These articles are inconsistent, and should be reconciled. The present fifty-second article of war, being the later expression of Congress on the subject, may be taken to represent the present policy of the law, and the fiftieth article should be amended to correspond therewith.

A strong argument in favor of making the suggested amendment, not considered by the Acting Judge Advocate General, is the great saving of valuable time and effort which would result. Under the law as it now stands the commanding general who must act on a sentence of death, which he does not desire to disapprove but which he can not mitigate, will probably begin by an effort to obtain a modified sentence from the court. To the time given the reconsideration of the sentence by members of the court must be added, in the event of its adherence to the original sentence, the time given the case by the Judge Advocate General and the officers of his department, by the Chief of Staff, by the Secretary of War, and, finally, by the President himself. Since all this will result ninety-nine times out of a hundred merely in confirming the recommendation made by the commanding general who submits the case, it is clear that it represents time lost in adherence to a formalism which no longer has any meaning or significance. Many cases of this character are known to have occurred during the present war and many more will doubtless arise.

4. From these considerations the War Plans Division is of the opinion that notwithstanding the fact that the law has long existed in the form in which it now stands, no sound reason has been advanced why it should not be changed in the manner suggested by Gen. Pershing. It goes without saying that any change adopted should be general in its character and not be made to apply to any particular commanding general, notwithstanding the nature and extent of his command, but should apply to all commanding generals similarly circumstanced. In the opinion of the War Plans Division the power of mitigation may safely be conferred upon commanding generals of armies in the field or of territorial departments or divisions. In cases which require the approval of the President before sentences may be carried into execution, it will be well to provide that these officers shall exercise this enlarged power of mitigation, amounting as it does to the commutation discussed by the Acting Judge Advocate General, only when specially empowered so to do by the President. This will be a recognition of the pardoning power conferred upon the President by the Constitution, and will remove in large part any legal basis that may exist for an argument that the amendment of the article herein suggested may be in derogation of the constitutional powers of the President.

5. The War Plans Division is of the opinion that the recommendation made by Gen. Pershing can be complied with and that the inconsistencies in the present Articles of War, above pointed out, can all be remedied by amending the fiftieth article of war. As that article now stands it consists of three paragraphs. The first paragraph should be amended to read as follows:

The power to order the execution of the sentence adjudged by a court-martial shall be held to include, inter alia, the power to mitigate or remit the whole, or any part of the sentence.

It will be noted that this proposed amendment omits the following words:

"But no sentence or dismissal of an officer and no sentence of death shall be mitigated or remitted by any authority inferior to the President."

The effect of this change will be to place it in the power of any convening authority to mitigate or remit a sentence which he may order executed. In practical effect it will operate only to confer upon a commanding general who may now order the execution of a sentence of death or of the dismissal of an officer the power to mitigate or remit such sentence.

The second paragraph of the fiftieth article of war should be amended by making that part of it following the semicolon read as follows:

But no sentence approved or confirmed by the President shall be remitted or mitigated by any other authority and no approved sentence of loss of files by an officer shall be remitted or mitigated by any authority inferior to the President, except as provided in the fifty-second article.

The practical effect of this change will be to make the paragraph conform with the first paragraph, as herein proposed to be amended, and with the fifty-second article of war as it now stands. It seems obvious that no sentence which has been approved or confirmed by the President should thereafter be mitigated or remitted by any inferior authority. So, also, where the sentence involves a loss of files and has not been suspended under the authority of the fifty-second article of war, it is clear that no authority inferior to the President should be authorized to thereafter mitigate or remit the sentence. Following the second paragraph of the fiftieth article of war a new paragraph should be inserted which should read as follows:

When empowered by the President so to do the commanding general of the Army in the field or the commanding general of the territorial department or division may mitigate or remit, and order executed as mitigated or remitted, any sentence which, under these articles, requires the confirmation of the President before the same may be executed.

The effect of this insertion will place it within the power of the President to authorize General Pershing, or any other commanding general similarly situated, and the commanding general of any territorial department or division to commute a sentence of death or of the dismissal of an officer which now requires the confirmation of the President before the same may be carried into execution. In other words, it provides the legal authority under which the President may make it unnecessary for such commanding generals to send to him for his action cases in which such sentences are involved and in which they do not believe that the sentences should be executed, but do believe that they should be mitigated, or, more technically speaking, commuted.

If the fiftieth article of war should be amended, as herein suggested, it would read as follows:

ART. 50. Mitigation or remission of sentences.—The power to order the execution of the sentence adjudged by a court-martial shall be held to include, inter alia, the power to mitigate or remit the whole or any part of the sentence.

An unexecuted portion of a sentence adjudged by a court-martial may be mitigated or remitted by the military authority competent to appoint, for the command, exclusive of penitentiaries and the United States Disciplinary Barracks, in which the person under sentence is held, a court of the kind that imposed the sentence, and the same power may be exercised by superior military authority; but no sentence approved or confirmed by the President shall be remitted or mitigated by any other authority, and no approved sentence of loss of files by an officer shall be remitted or mitigated by any authority inferior to the President, except as provided in the fifty-second article.

When empowered by the President so to do the commanding general of the Army in the field or the commanding general of the Territorial department or division may mitigate or remit, and order executed as mitigated or remitted, any sentence which under these articles requires the confirmation of the President before the same may be executed.

The power of remission and mitigation shall extend to all uncollected forfeitures adjudged by sentence of a court-martial.

It should be noticed that under the fiftieth article of war any sentence fixed by a commanding general under the enlarged power herein proposed is always subject to correction by superior authority by further mitigation or remission. It is difficult to see wherein this power would or could be abused or wherein it would or could lead to results which are inconsistent with results obtained under the present system. That the administration of justice would be expedited in certain cases and that the general burden of administrative work would be lessened has been shown above.

6. The War Plans Division therefore recommends that these papers be filed in the office of The Adjutant General and that favorable action be taken looking to the amendment of the fiftieth article of war. It submits herewith appropriate letters, containing draft of a bill designed to carry this recommendation into effect, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, United States Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, September 19, 1918.

The CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
United States Senate.

SIR: The following is a draft of a bill amending the fiftieth article of war:

As amended by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That article 50 of section 1342 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by the act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes,' approved August 29, 1916, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"ART. 50. MITIGATION OR REMISSION OF SENTENCES.—The power to order the execution of the sentence adjudged by a court-martial shall be held to include, inter alia, the power to mitigate or remit the whole or any part of the sentence.

"Any unexecuted portion of a sentence adjudged by a court-martial may be mitigated or remitted by the military authority competent to appoint, for the command, exclusive of penitentiaries and the United States Disciplinary Barracks, in which the person under sentence is held, a court of the kind that imposed the sentence, and the same power may be exercised by superior military authority; but no sentence approved or confirmed by the President shall be remitted or mitigated by any other authority, and no approved sentence of loss of files by an officer shall be remitted or mitigated by any authority inferior to the President except as provided in the fifty-second article.

"When empowered by the President so to do, the commanding general of the Army in the field or the commanding general of the territorial department or division may mitigate or remit, and order executed as mitigated or remitted, any sentence which, under these articles, requires the confirmation of the President before the same may be executed.

"The power of remission and mitigation shall extend to all uncollected forfeitures adjudged by sentence of a court-martial."

This amendment is designed to confer upon the commanding general of an army in the field or of a territorial department or division the power to mitigate or remit any sentence of death or of dismissal of an officer, which he now has the authority to approve and execute, without referring the same to the President for his action; and also to confer upon the President the authority to empower such commanding general to mitigate or remit sentences of death or of the dismissal of an officer in those cases where the sentence can, under the forty-eighth article of war, be carried into effect only upon the approval of the President. It is found in actual practice that whenever a commanding general does not approve a sentence of death or of the dismissal of an officer, and recommends mitigation thereof, the action of the President is generally in accordance with such recommendation. Moreover, it appears unsound to deny a commanding general the power to mitigate a sentence which he has the authority to approve and execute.

Gen. Pershing has recommended the changes herein proposed. They have been found necessary, also, in so far as a sentence of dismissal of an officer is concerned, for the purpose of reconciling the fiftieth article of war with the fifty-second article, as amended by the act of Congress approved July 9, 1918 (Public, 193, 65th Cong.) Under the fiftieth article of war, as it now stands, no reviewing authority inferior to the President can mitigate or remit a sentence of dismissal of an officer. Under the fifty-second article, as recently amended, any such convening authority can suspend any sentence of dismissal of an officer. Under the fifty-second article, as recently amended, any such convening authority can suspend any sentence of dismissal of an officer, and having suspended it may later mitigate or remit it. These two articles are inconsistent as they now stand, and it is hoped to reconcile them by the proposed amendment of the fiftieth article of war submitted herein.

It is hoped that this matter may receive the early and favorable consideration of your committee.

Respectfully,

BENEDICT CROWELL,
Acting Secretary of War.

EXHIBIT 148.

ATLANTIC BRANCH UNITED STATES DISCIPLINARY BARRACKS,
Governors Island, N. Y., April 15, 1919.

From: The commandant.

To: Memorandum for the Inspector General, attention Col. Charles H. Patterson.

Subject: Disciplinary barracks, Governors Island, N. Y.

The military offender.—Upon the admission of a convicted offender to the disciplinary barracks two courses of action toward him are possible—one punitive, the other reconstructive.

The first means the applying of the strictest discipline and the placing of the offender at tasks which will cause him, if possible, to regret most thoroughly his ever having become involved in trouble. The other involves the relaxation of military discipline to some degree and the education of the offender by suitable methods so as to equip him the better to avoid offending in the future.

The treatment of the military offender at these barracks has been along reconstructive lines, and this course has been followed for several reasons. First, offenders are in a great majority of cases not sent to the disciplinary barracks for their first offenses. Their records usually show several previous offenses due to maladjustment to military discipline. The imposition of a stricter and harsher discipline, while it would control the offender for the time being, at the same time would not hold out assurances that the relaxation of it after release would have accomplished the desired result, namely, normal adjustment to the demands of civil or military life. This is more clearly demonstrated by our second consideration, the study of the man behind the offense.

Every military prisoner upon admission is given a thorough mental and physical examination. In addition, a correspondence field study is employed. Every possible source of information is made use of to obtain a complete history of the offender, so that at the end of a month or six weeks we are in a position to make a reasonably accurate estimate of the kind of man we are dealing with, what his requirements are, what his abilities, and are in a position to make at least a tentative prediction as to his future possibilities.

Resulting from these studies we find that some offenders are medically sick men, such as the insane, the epileptic, the feeble-minded, the drug addict, and in some cases the alcoholic. Others show character defects which have resulted in an antisocial attitude—the criminals—or an inability to adjust themselves to any environment, as shown by truancy in school life and lack of persistence in employment, nomadism, etc.

A relatively small number can be said to be normal or accidental offenders, whose delinquencies are chargeable to social or economic conditions.

Third, to treat military offenders in accordance with up-to-date recognized methods.

The first or punitive method of treatment should be the method prevailing in a regular organization and carried out by that organization, resulting in short, disagreeable sentences in the post guardhouse. It is not possible nor desirable to employ the reconstructive method of treatment in a regular military organization. However, if the repeated infliction of short punishments for offenses does not result in the permanent correction of an offender he then become a candidate for the reconstructive method of treatment as practiced in the disciplinary barracks.

The treatment of the military offender in the disciplinary barracks has a two-fold object—first, to return him to the colors a better soldier, or, secondly, if unfitted for military service, to return him to civil life, if possible, a better citizen.

The disciplinary battalion.—Any prisoner, regardless of his offense or the length of his sentence, is eligible to this battalion who, after a thorough study of him as outlined above, appears capable of resuming his place in the military service. The battalion is removed from the general barracks population and is quartered in a cantonment building such as have been used during the war at the various camps. While the discipline in the battalion is very strict—in fact, much more so than in the average organization—still the members of the battalion are given considerable liberty on the theory that it is wiser to detect those who are lacking in self-control before rather than after restoration. The battalion barracks has neither bolts nor bars; the battalion cooks and serves its own rations and does its own guard duty. It is under the supervision of one commissioned and several noncommissioned officers.

If after three months of intensive military training a member of the battalion is certified as capable of taking his place in a regular military organization, he is recommended for restoration to the service.

Numbered men.—The numbered men consist of those whose examinations show that they are not desirable for the disciplinary battalion, although some after further observation may prove to be so. The treatment of these men is along educational and vocational lines. Fully 40 per cent of them show the need of education. Classes in primary subjects are conducted during the morning hours by experienced Y. M. C. A. teachers for this class. In the afternoon the same organization conducts classes for more advanced work. In the evening classes of a vocational and educational nature, such as electrical installation, vocal and instrumental music, etc., are in session.

In the vocational work advantage is taken of the existing shops. Others will be added, in which to place prisoners after examination, where some useful trade may be acquired.

The honor association.—Included in our educational system we have instituted an honor system among the prisoners. In the study of our offenders it was found that such a large percentage had shown themselves incapable of continuously adjusting themselves in a normal manner to the demands of civil as well as military life that it was deemed wise to create among them a tangible social organization. It was recognized that wherever a body of men are in close contact for any length of time the prevailing feeling or tone of that body will be determined by the more assertive members. In prisons and other penal institutions where there is no authorized and recognized organization the antagonistic, antisocial and habitual criminal element is more in evidence. Accidental offenders and those who strive to avoid further trouble are inclined to keep by themselves and to serve out their sentences without associating much with others, even with those of their own kind. The lawless element are naturally attracted to each other and, in reality, possess the nucleus of an organization, which quickly crystallizes when any advantage can be gained. When thus crystallized the weaker characters are easily prevailed upon to follow and others are forced to join them by means of threats and other methods of intimidation. A disciplinary barracks is never free from this danger. Consequently, if a recognized organization with the better element in control of it, and subject to the supervision of the officers, can be formed the lawless and antagonistic element is placed at a disadvantage and the possibility of their quickly organizing and attracting others is reduced to a minimum. The educational value of such an organization is based on the theory that members will realize that individual misbehavior reacts unfavorably on the whole body. The association has its rules and regulations and its tribunals for the trial and punishment of its own offenders. In this way members of the honor association are taught while in the barracks a respect for constituted law and order. Certain privileges are given for good conduct and certain punishments are prescribed for misbehavior, so that it is to the advantage of the organization to keep "barracks offences" down to a minimum. It is hoped that the lessons learned in their own organization will be applied to the larger social order upon their release.

The honor association includes all but 30 prisoners. Every new arrival is met by a member of the association and is made acquainted with the benefits of its membership. In this way new arrivals are immediately brought in contact with the better element, whereas in the past it was the disgruntled and antagonistic element which first approached the new comer.

The association has regular weekly meetings. It has its own constitution, by-laws, rules and regulations and standing committees. It pledges itself through appointed sergeants at arms to maintain good order in and about the barracks and to be careful of all sanitary and other regulations. If any member of the association detects another breaking any rule of the barracks he is in honor bound to report the offense to the organization. The offending member is then brought before the association's tribunal and if found guilty is asked to sign a statement requesting that he undergo the punishment prescribed by the court.

The association has a grievance committee which meets the commandant weekly to present to him matters of interest in the association and possible grievances. As a result, no matter of dissatisfaction is harbored amongst the prisoners without the commandant's knowledge. Recently, this committee notified the commandant that the organization was having some difficulty with its offending members. These members preferred trial by the prison of trial by the honor court for the reason that the punishments were less severe than by the latter. It was requested that the prescribed by the prison court be made equal in severity to those of the honor court.

As a result of this association both to the prisoners and to the barracks gambling has been eliminated from the institution, the number of prisoners in the honor court has decreased fully 75 per cent. Better order prevails in the hall, the yard, in fact, the whole tone of the barracks is improved. The prisoners are more contented and misbehavior is reduced to a minimum.

—Appropriate recreation is enjoyed by prisoners, consisting of musicals and other shows at regular intervals, and athletic games out —Much has been said in newspaper articles recently about the severity of courts-martial sentences and, unfortunately, nothing about the practical working out of these sentences in the discipline of the barracks. The man behind the sentence is considered here more than the sentence itself. In fact, every sentence is indeterminate and indefinite. It has happened, and has happened often, that prisoners sentenced to serve upward of a year have been restored to the colors in fewer months. In fact, it is possible for a prisoner with a life sentence to be restored to a regular organization in a few months. In the case of numbered men, recommendations for their release have been made for various reasons—on account of youth, mental inadequacy, personality, nervous instability, and the financial condition of the dependents—so that in the case of these prisoners, as well as of the numbered men, the sentence really cuts but little figure. This practice of releasing prisoners for release, as outlined above, was the general policy of the institution months before the present clemency board was appointed. As a matter of fact we are confronted by a much greater administrative problem with the short sentences now imposed than by the longer ones. Men with short sentences are generally apathetic as to restoration. Six months of good-conduct time deducted, releases a man by expiration of sentence in five months, too short a time for the corrective and disciplinary influence of the sentence to become sufficiently effective to warrant restoration. Sentences shorter than six months, and some are shorter, practically preclude the possibility of extending restoration. There are two or three cases recently come to my attention of positive victims of short sentences. One has been continuously in the hospital with ear trouble, and no corrective or disciplinary measures could be applied before the expiration of his sentence. This is especially so on the entrance to the institution of a short-term prisoner. He may, at first, not desire to work for restoration, but later on he changes his mind, but when this decision is made it frequently happens that such a short period left as to render impossible the restoring of the prisoner in the usual way.

Prisoners should be sent to the disciplinary barracks for a shorter period than is now the case. Men with longer sentences have something definite to work for. It is not the case with shorter-term men. The longer sentence awakens in the prisoner a healthy, laudable endeavor, while the shorter sentence stifles the initiative. The short-term prisoner sits back and waits for the end of his sentence. His desire to work for restoration fall on deaf ears, and the morale of the institution is in consequence lowered.

—One of the vexatious problems with which we have to contend is the ex-convicts, some of whom were released from prison to the barracks. Such men are considered bad risks for restoration. Usually, conditions exist on which recommendation for clemency in their cases is not possible. In consequence of their realizing that they can not be restored to the barracks they become disgruntled and are a very disturbing element. Furthermore, it is not at all desirable to have the ordinary military offender, often impressionable, come in contact with this class of men. They are subjects for the disciplinary barracks and should have been sent, if possible, to a Federal penitentiary. At least some provision should be made if they are to be held in custody, for their proper segregation.

ATLANTIC BRANCH, UNITED STATES DISCIPLINARY BARRACKS,

April 15, 1919.

The foregoing article has been prepared and written by the following members of the executive committee: Edward M. Hancock (5379), George S. Schuyler (5820), Abraham Henschel (5617), Edward Schwartz (6122), Harry Lee (6033), Hyman Zimmerman (4868), Louis G. Lemley (5706). With feeling of the deepest gratitude do we hereby submit this article to the commandant, Col. John E. Hunt, United States Army.

OUR HONOR ASSOCIATION.

As men have always risen to the highest pinnacles amongst oppressing circumstances, so have we, the inmates of Castle William, in our darkest hours of life, conceived and promulgated the ideals set forth in this preamble to our constitution.

In obedience to the voice of nature, which inspires men to perfection, in compliance with the dictates of the human mind, which prompt men to activity, the honor association was organized January 26, 1919, to avoid the evils of disorganization toward what is just and right.

The objects of this organization are to create a local sentiment which will condemn local wrongdoing, to teach the men to be intolerant of evil, to obey the rules and regulations prescribed for our general conduct and discipline, to respect the authorities and to heartily aid them by a most earnest cooperation, and to be honor bound individually in the accomplishment of these aims: finally, to upbuild and uplift the character of the men, so that they be better fitted to occupy their positions as free moral agents in society.

Previous to the organization of this association, discipline was maintained and enforced by the strictest measures. This form of discipline had been known as the iron rule. Under this régime men were at all times compelled to work under duress. Minor infractions of prison regulations were drastically dealt with. The men refrained from doing wrong because of the fear of punishment, not because they had any desire to do right. This system of force only tends to make criminals out of petty offenders, instead of better citizens, because there was no appeal to the men's sense of honor.

One day toward the close of 1918, a group of inmates gathered in an assembly and discussed how they could help themselves best, the result of which formed the nucleus of the present organization. From time to time as the development of this nucleus became visible there appeared, though gradually, the opportunity for selfish advantage by some of the organization's officials, rather than for the betterment of its members as a whole. It was revealed that the men intrusted with the leadership of this organization were trying to prostitute its principles, in order to further their own personal ends. The inevitable result was that each one of these selfish leaders tried to outdo the other one in gaining every possible advantage through his position of trust. This culminated in the leaders bringing their personal affairs and grievances before the legislative assembly and attempting to sway the members by dilatory practices. The legislative body reacted in a manner hardly anticipated by these selfish leaders; the members, however, realized that in order to maintain the principles upon which the organization was created they would have to remove this dangerous element, and reconstruct the organization on a firmer basis to eliminate the possibility for individuals to use the association for furthering their personal interests.

Through the unceasing efforts and splendid example set by the members of the executive committee, there was instilled into the minds of the members the realization that discipline could be gained through the sincere cooperation of all with the officials of the institution. Ultimately the ideals embodied in the preamble became manifested materially in the deeds of the men. Gradually there evolved a spirit drawn about by the zealous efforts of the three branches of the association, namely, legislative, judicial, and executive. The resultant mental development caused members to more fully understand their duties and obligations, and more to perform these same duties and meet their obligations and responsibilities at all times under all conditions. The legislative assembly elects 10 men to sit in executive council for the purpose of representing the inmates before the officials of the institution and to convey to them their needs. The association has a judicial branch in which is embodied the honor court and the judiciary committee, the former to try all violators of the institution's rules and regulations properly brought before them, and the latter to form and from time to time revise the court-martial manual of the honor association. This honor court is one of the greatest helps to the prisoners and the authorities. It is a help to the inmates in that they do not lose good time when tried by it, nor do they get a black mark against their record. If an offense is committed and the offender discovered by one of the members of the association, the man is brought up for trial and sentenced with his consent. The main office is absolutely ignorant of the fact that an offense has been committed or that a sentence has been meted out. It is a great help to the authorities in that it lessens by 75 per cent the number of courts-martial by their court, thus making it possible for them to conscientiously recommend more men for clemency and restoration. It protects the inmates in that they commit less offenses and take pride in the knowledge that they are law-abiding; it protects them from the brutality of medieval disciplinary methods. Since the establishment of the honor association approximately 5 per cent of the total population of this institution have been tried by the honor court for minor infractions of rules and regulations. Of these brought to trial, 60 per cent have been found guilty and sentenced to various punishments, such as sleeping three nights in solitary, a loss of privileges gained by the honor association for a prescribed period of time. It is the duty of every member to report even the smallest violation of regulations to the sergeants at arms, who prefer charges against the offenders. The same are then tried by the honor court, which is so conducted that the interests of the accused and the honor association are equally safeguarded in every possible manner. The small violations being thus promptly attended to, the more serious ones become a rare occurrence or disappear entirely. Thus the strictest discipline is maintained, based upon honor and intelligence and not on fear. The gaining of discipline without the officials of the institution being troubled with it causes them to be more kindly disposed toward the inmates.

Through the rapid growth of the association and expansion of its activities in several fields, particularly educational and recreational, there was arranged a more elaborate program than anything heretofore attempted in the annals of an institution of this kind. Through the efforts of the executive committee all men are enabled to avail themselves of the opportunity to pursue any course of study of their election. Men are given relaxation from the day's work by being provided with wholesome entertainment.

We owe a debt of gratitude to the officials of this institution for the assistance they have rendered us in accomplishing our ideals, and we sincerely hope that the facts and conditions as described in this article will serve as an inspiration and incentive to the inmates and officials of institutions of similar character throughout our beloved United States.

THE HONOR ASSOCIATION, Per EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.

Therefore, in the early part of January, 1919, a new executive committee was elected, consisting of men possessing qualities which rendered them more fitted to the positions of trust to which they were elected. This committee was delegated to draft a new constitution for the organization, henceforth to be known as the honor association. This constitution was completed on January 26, 1919, submitted to and adopted by the legislative body on same date. The following is a true copy of the constitution and its amendments to date:

CONSTITUTION OF THE HONOR ASSOCIATION.

ARTICLE 1. This organization shall be known as the honor association, headed by a president elected by the executive board. The executive board shall also elect a vice president to discharge the duties of president in case of his absence, inability, or recall.

ART. 2. The organization shall be divided into three branches: (a) Legislative, (b) executive, (c) judicial.

The legislative branch shall be composed of the governing body, comprising all the members of the organization.

The legislative branch shall meet every Sunday evening.

The legislative branch shall enact all the laws of the organization by a majority of votes.

Any member of the association may submit to the legislative assembly, through the judiciary committee, bills necessary for the welfare of the organization.

The judiciary committee will pass on their constitutionality and report its findings.

A quorum of the legislative branch shall consist of a majority of the members.

The executive branch shall be incorporated in a board elected by the legislative body.

The executive branch shall execute all measures acted upon by the governing body and shall appoint such officers, committees, and personnel as may become necessary.

The executive branch shall function through the following committees: (a) Entertainment committee, (b) initiation and classification committee, (c) committee on law and order, (d) complain committee, (e) educational committee, (f) judiciary committee.

Members of the executive committee shall individually be appointed as heads of the respective committees.

The judicial branch shall be embodied in a committee appointed by the executive committee.

The judicial branch shall have charge, through its subdivisions, of the maintenance of law and order and the punishment of infractions thereof.

ART. 3. The executive committee shall be composed of 10 members (5 company men and 5 numbered men), who shall be elected by secret ballot by the members of the legislative body from 20 proposed candidates, i. e., 10 from the company and 10 from the numbers, 1 of each 5 being a colored man, to represent his race.

Each voter will be provided with a ballot with the two lists of 10 men, 1 from the company and the other from the numbers. Each man will designate 5 men from each list of 10 by making a cross opposite the names of 10 candidates he wants to elect, sign his name and number, and hand the ballot in to the collector.

All vacancies that may occur on the executive committee shall remain unfilled until the legislative body's earliest convention, with the exception of numbered men going into the company or company men going into the numbers, in which case they will hold their office until the expiration of their terms, when new members will be elected as aforesaid.

The term of office for a member elected to the executive committee shall not be less than four months, beginning from date of election.

Members of the executive committee shall be eligible for reelection.

In the event of an executive committee member being transferred from the numbers to the company, or vice versa, such member shall continue to represent that division from which he was elected.

Any member of the executive committee who is convicted of any violation of the Constitution or is proved to be incapable for the continuance of said office shall be subject to recall.

The executive committee shall meet the Thursday before the convention of the legislative body and the Monday following.

The executive committee shall review all matters pertaining to the welfare of the organization and present same to the president of the legislative body for presentation to the said body and to the commandant.

A quorum of the executive committee shall consist of a majority of the members.

ART. 4. An honor court shall be appointed by the executive committee, composed of five members of the legislative body.

A president of the honor court shall be appointed by the executive committee.

There shall be three supernumeraries appointed to fill respective vacancies that may occur on the honor court.

When the president of the honor court is absent the members of said court shall be empowered to elect a president pro tem.

There shall be a judge advocate, who shall have an assistant; both shall be appointed by the executive board.

There shall be a recorder appointed by the executive committee to assist the judge advocate.

ART. 5. The entertainment committee shall classify all theatrical and athletic talent of honor association, for the purpose of private entertainment and amusement.

The initiation and classification committee shall interview all newcomers and acquaint them with the honor association in all its details, and shall classify the men desiring membership.

The committee of law and order shall enforce all laws and acts as passed by the legislative body.

The chairman of the committee of law and order shall be known as the sergeant at arms.

The complaint committee shall hear all complaints pertaining to discipline, preservation of order and efficiency of any department or member thereof.

The educational committee shall: (a) Classify talent; (b) provide lecturers; (c) assist in general enlightenment; (d) encourage and conduct educational classes.

The judiciary committee shall be empowered to form and revise the Court-Martial Manual and set maximum and minimum sentences to be submitted to the executive committee for them to tender to the legislative body for their approval.

The personnel of the various committees shall be subject to the approval of the executive committee before appointment.

No man shall serve at the head of two committees except executive committee members.

The heads of the respective committees shall render a full report once a month to the executive committee.

ART. 6. The president shall call the meetings of the governing body.

The president shall not remove the chair automatically.

The president shall have charge of the correspondence of the association.

The president shall report to the legislative body once a week the doings of the executive committee.

The executive committee shall be represented at all interviews with the commandant by the president and two other members, excepting such times when the commandant should request the presence of the entire committee, or any specified member thereof.

The judiciary committee shall pass on the constitutionality of all measures before they are presented to the legislative body for enactment.

ART. 7. The members of the honor association shall consist of all those whose names appear on the roster of the initiation and classification committee.

There shall be roll call at every meeting of the legislative body; all members who absent themselves from three consecutive meetings shall forfeit their membership for a period of one month, unless such absence shall be shown to have been unavoidable.

ART. 8. Amendments to the constitution shall be passed by a two-thirds vote of the legislative body.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION OF THE HONOR ASSOCIATION.

ART. 3. The executive committee shall consist of 10 members elected by the legislative body by secret ballot. There shall be one member from each disciplinary company and eight members from the numbers, one of whom shall be a colored man.

All vacancies that may occur on the executive committee shall remain unfilled until the legislative body's earliest convention.

The term of office for a member elected to the executive committee shall be four months, beginning from date of election, with the exception of numbered men being transferred into the disciplinary battalion and men of the disciplinary battalion being transferred back into the numbers, in which event their terms shall automatically expire on date of transfer.

Any member of the executive committee who violates any article of the constitution or any of the rules and regulations of the association or who is found incapable of continuance as an executive committee member, shall be subject to recall by a majority vote of the legislative body.

Recalls must be founded on some grounds and tangible facts. After a recall is moved and seconded by 20 members, a special board of 10 members not holding office in the association will be formed by the legislative body's election. This board will investigate the charges against the accused executive committee member, examine and cross-examine all the witnesses, and report its findings, with its recommendations, to the succeeding legislative body convention. This convention will act according to the light thrown upon the question by the labors of the special board.

The recall of the president of the association from that office shall be by secret ballot of the executive committee with majority of opinion concurring. Should it become incident upon the recall of the president from that office, a question as to his retention on the executive committee, action will be taken as specified above.

ART. 6, PAR. 6. The president shall at all times be guided by the opinions of the other members of the executive committee. He shall veto no measures without the approval of the executive committee, nor shall he sign any measures that the committee has disapproved of.

Should the president for any reason fail to sign a measure within 10 days after it has been passed by the legislative body, it shall automatically become a law.

ART. 8. Executive committee and members of the committee on law and order shall wear a distinctive badge of office. This shall be subject to the approval of the prison authorities.

All nominations for executive committee members must be seconded by a minimum of 20 members of the legislative body.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL,
Washington, March 22, 1918.

Memorandum for Gen. Crowder.

A study of the records of trial by general court-martial received in this office shows the following:

Many of our judge advocates in the field fail properly to scrutinize charges referred for trial, with the result that many trials are being held on irregular or insufficient specifications.

Entirely too many men are being tried by general court-martial. I think it conservative to state that at least 25 per cent of the cases tried by general court-martial could be properly disposed of by minor courts or by administrative punishments under the one hundred and fourth article of war.

The actual trial of cases is, in many respects, poorly planned. Joint offenders are separately charged and separately tried by the same court in cases where there should undoubtedly be a joint trial. Important cases are frequently referred to incompetent trial judge advocates. In many divisions entirely too much time is allowed to elapse between arrest or confinement and trial, and in many there are long delays between trial and action by the reviewing authority.

More important, however, is the evident failure on the part of judge advocates to understand the policy of the department with reference to the conservation of man power. Men are still being tried and dishonorably discharged the service for trivial offenses, which could be otherwise adequately punished. In many divisions there seems to be an unsympathetic use of the power to suspend sentences of dishonorable discharge. It is my view that, during this war at least, in every case where confinement is to be in a disciplinary barracks the dishonorable discharge should be suspended and the officers of the disciplinary barracks made responsible for saying that the man should not ultimately be sent back to serve with the colors.

In proposing corrective action for the difficulties outlined above, I think it may be accepted as fundamental that there should be the closest possible cooperation and understanding between this office and its representatives in the field. That this office should know the circumstances under which judge advocates in the field have performed their duty and that the latter should understand fully what this office is trying to accomplish and be able to work in sympathy therewith.

There should be a unity of purpose and understanding between this office and the commanding officers of the disciplinary barracks on the question of restoration to duty, in order that in time of war as many men as possible shall be given an opportunity to redeem themselves through actual service.

To accomplish these ends it is my opinion that nothing else could be productive of so much good as personal conferences and instruction. A good plan would be to hold a conference of all judge advocates for the purpose of discussing these problems, and others which might arise, and suggesting practical solutions. This, however, would seem to be impracticable. The next best plan would be to have a representative of this office make a visit of inspection and instruction to the various division and department headquarters. Since this would take him by the disciplinary barracks, there should also be included in the itinerary a conference with the officers of these institutions. You suggested yesterday that if anyone made a trip of this kind you would want me to make it. I think myself that if I am to remain on this desk during the war I should be the one to go. I have phrased and formulated the instructions that have been sent out as the policy of the department with reference to the conservation of man-power, and I think I am in position to bring judge advocates to understand how an intelligent application of that policy would reduce the number of trials and save men to the service. It would also help immeasurably in the work of the disciplinary desk if the officer in charge had personal knowledge of the conditions which exist in the field.

Such a tour would be of value in another direction. It would enable me to make a personal report on each judge advocate and his assistant. This report, together with other valuable data, might well be made the basis of special recognition in certain cases and of getting rid of undesirable or inept officers in others.

When this visit has been made for the purpose of inspecting those who are at present acting as judge advocates of departments and divisions, I should strongly recommend that thereafter no new man should be sent to duty as the judge advocate of a command unless he had previously had a course of training in this office. This would give him a viewpoint of the service as a whole which many of our present judge advocates seem to lack.

It would take about five weeks to make this trip properly. As to whether I can be spared from the office at this time, I suggest that I could well make arrangements to leave in about 10 days or two weeks. By that time the new men will have been pretty well broken in and the work brought up to date. I think Col. Clark could carry on the work without difficulty. There could be no question except as to purely military or administrative matters, and he has these remarkably well in mind at the present time. On any question of doubt he could take advice and need not go wrong.

As a corollary of the matter here under question, I suggest that if you decide to authorize this trip of inspection and instruction, that Col. Clark's hands might be strengthened by bringing in Maj. Barnwell for duty in this office. He is now on duty as judge advocate of the Southeastern Department. I have several times noted the quality of his work. He seems to be a splendid lawyer. His opinions are always clear and convincing. If you decide to give Maj. Hamar a position as judge advocate, he might be sent to the Southeastern Department, relieving Maj. Barnwell for duty here.

As to the expense involved, it would be insignificant compared with the direct benefits that would be almost immediately realized. If I could reduce the number of trials by general court-martial by a substantial percentage the expense of the trip would be saved many times over each month, to say nothing ing of the saving to the country if we can obtain a systematic treatment of the policy of conserving and using the man-power of the country which has been brought into the service.

Memorandum for the Chief of Staff.

Subject: Amendment of the forty-eighth article of war.

1. The following cablegram has been received from Gen. Pershing, requesting action be taken amending the forty-eighth article of war, so that he may be able to confirm all death sentences and order their execution:

"Paragraph 1B, cablegram No. 1059, dated May 5, 1918. In order that prompt exemplary action may be taken in necessary cases, I recommend that forty-eighth article of war be so amended as to authorize me to confirm all death sentences and order their execution. Full power as to death sentences in French Army and British Army in France is vested in military authorities. (Pershing.)"

2. The President has already acted upon this cablegram and has stated that he declines to recommend to Congress action looking to conferring power of confirming death sentences upon commanding generals in the field further than they have at present. A cablegram to Gen. Pershing, embodying the President's views, drafted in the office of the Judge Advocate General, has been or will shortly be sent to Gen. Pershing. There remains, therefore, nothing to be done in regard to this matter.

WAR DEPARTMENT.
OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL,
Washington, January 2, 1919.

From: The Office of the Judge Advocate General.
To: The Adjutant General.
Subject: Recommendation that Brig. Gen. Samuel T. Ansell be presented a distinguished-service medal.

1. I recommend that Brig. Gen. Samuel T. Ansell, Judge Advocate General's Department, United States Army, be presented the distinguished-service medal for exceptionally meritorious service to the Government as acting head of the Judge Advocate General's Department during this war.

2. Gen. Ansell's services have been, in my judgment, preeminently of the kind that the statute contemplates thus to be awarded. His duties have been of fundamental importance and great responsibility, and he has shown himself exceptionally qualified in the performance of them. His legal ability, his general qualifications and attainments, his personality, energy, and capacity for scientific organization and vigorous administration, his judgment and prevision, enabled him at the outset to appreciate and encompass the legal duties involved in the raising, maintenance, and administration of a vast military establishment, and to organize the department for the proper performance of those duties. Those same qualities have enabled him at all times to perform them in a way that has appreciably contributed to victory.

3. His hundreds, even thousands, of thoughtful opinions on the records of the department show that he has been a powerful instrument in aiding in the organization of the new establishment within the law, in keeping it within its proper relation to civil instructions and the law of the land, in conforming military administration to the requirements of law, and in maintaining law and justice within the Army. This he has done without placing impediments in the way of rightful administration, but instead, such administration has been given legal direction and effectual impulse.

4. His leading opinions have enunciated many great principles of law fundamental to military administration, a few of which are those which had to do with—

(a) The conclusiveness, as against judicial inquiry, of the legislatively established administrative methods of the selective-service system.

(b) Military jurisdiction over the civil personnel auxiliary to military activities.

(c) Restriction of the rule against the redelegation of power as necessitated by modern military administration.

(d) The general adjustment of peace-time legislation to war conditions.

(e) Unification of variant and sporadic legislation, and adapting the whole to a single organizational system.

(f) Military unity—"there is but one Army, the Army of the United States, of which the variously designated forces are but components."

(g) The modern legal concept, that courts-martial are tribunals for the trial of conduct as crime in violation of the general law of the land, and not only in its military aspect, requires that the Articles of War be construed with more and more regard to the Constitutional principles governing criminal prosecutions.

5. In view of the above, I recommend the award of the medal.

EXHIBIT 154.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL,
Washington, March 24, 1919.

From: Col. B. A. Read.

To: The Inspector General of the Army.

Subject: Present organization of the Military Justice Division of the Office of the Judge Advocate General.

1. The Military Justice Division passes upon questions that arise in the administration of justice by courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and military commissions and the reviews of all records of trial by general courts-martial. Its duties include the preparation of reports upon application of clemency; the solution of problems relating to the disciplinary barracks and the government of military prisons, and all matters having to do with the discipline of the Army, in so far as it involves the administration of the office of the Judge Advocate General.

2. This division is divided into eight main sections, as follows:

(1) A board of review consisting of two sections, whose duties are in the nature of those of an appellate tribunal. The board of review, under the general direction of the head of this department and the chief of this division, reviews all proceedings and all general courts-martial received in this office which are reviewed in writing. The preliminary review of any such case, after having been prepared by the officer to whom the record has been assigned and after it has been reviewed and passed upon by the chief of his section, is transmitted to the proper section of the board of review, and thereupon the members of this section of the board consider the preliminary review jointly and concurrently in the manner similar to that employed by appellate tribunals in rendering their decisions. The board of review may modify or rewrite such review or may direct that it be modified or rewritten so as to express their views.

The first section of the board of review reviews all cases of officers who are dismissed from the service and all cases where the sentence of the court is death.

The second section of the board of review reviews all cases of officers not involving dismissal and cases where the sentence is to a penitentiary, and such cases as may be sent to it from the Disciplinary Barracks section, or the retained in service section, where a written review is prepared. In the present press of work this section of the board is also reviewing certain cases involving the death penalty and the dismissal of officers.

(2) Opinions section.—This section drafts opinions and prepares indorsements and memoranda on such miscellaneous questions as may be assigned to it by the head of the division; drafts charges against alleged offenders in special instances and examines and revises reviews of general courts-martial records on trials of conscientious objectors, written by other officers of the division.

(3) Dismissals and capital sentences section.—The officers of this section examine records and write reviews of such records in all trials by general courts-martial with sentences imposing dismissal, or dismissal and confinement of an officer, or death of a soldier, officer or other person subject to military law. When an officer in this division has examined the record and prepared his written review thereof, it is examined and reviewed by the chief of the section, who, if he does not agree therewith or for any reason may desire further consideration of the matter in the section, may assign the record to a third officer for his examination and review.

(4) Penitentiary sentences and officers' cases not involving dismissal section.—The officers of this section examine and prepare written reviews of all trials by general courts-martial, which have resulted in sentences imposing confinement in the penitentiary or punishment of officers not involving dismissal, and the procedure is similar to that had in the dismissal and capital sentences section.

(5) Disciplinary barracks sentences section.—The officers of this section review the records of trial by general courts-martial resulting in sentences imposing dishonorable discharge and confinement in the disciplinary barracks or in any of its branches. These records are carefully checked to see that they are legally sufficient, and if so found they are sent to the record room for filing. If, however, for any reason substantial legal error appears in the record, a review is written thereon and the procedure thereafter is similar to that in the dismissal and capital sentences section.

(6) Retained in service sentences section.—The officers of the section examine and review the records of general courts-martial where the sentences provide for the retention of the accused in the service, including sentences with suspension of dishonorable discharge. The procedure in this section is similar to that had in the disciplinary barracks sentences section.

(7) Clemency and restoration section.—The officers of this section consider all appeals by prisoners, their relatives, or friends for clemency or restoration to the colors and prepare in writing for the head of the division their recommendations upon such appeals. In preparing these recommendations, mitigating circumstances in the commission of the offense, the good conduct of the prisoner prior and subsequent to the offense; his mental or physical deficiency, and other similar matters are weighed and considered. This section also considers recommendations for clemency referred to it by officers of other Memorandum for Capt. K. S. Wallace, War College.

Subject: The Judge Advocate General's Department of the Army.

1. In compliance with the request from your office for a brief statement showing the history and conduct of this department, Gen. S. T. Ansell has hurriedly dictated the following memorandum, which is furnished you for such use as you may see fit to make of it:

This department is older than the Government, having been established during the War of the Revolution. Its duties have grown immeasurably, both in scope and volume, and its personnel has increased from that of a single officer in the beginning to its present proportions. Before the existing war was declared the department consisted of one Judge Advocate General and 12 other officers, a force which was sufficient to administer to the small establishment then existing, but with the creation of the new Army the volume of work has increased more than proportionally with the increase in the Army itself. To-day the commissioned personnel of the department approximates 200.

The duties of this department are little understood, even in the Army. It is ordinarily conceived to be simply the law department of the Army. It is that, and much more. The title itself is significant and is indicative of the quasi-judicial character of the duties of this office. Those duties may be divided into three classes: The department is adviser and counselor of the Army as an institution of government, and of all the individuals thereof, from the Secretary of War to the most recently joined recruit; it is also in a very real sense the judge of their official conduct; lastly, and of very great importance, it must see that justice under law is done each individual of the Army in the maintenance of discipline.

The department itself consists of the office of the Judge Advocate General, which is a bureau of the War Department at Washington, and all the officers belonging to the Judge Advocate General's Department on field duty attached as judge advocates to the various field commands. Each commanding general of a division or department or larger organization has upon his staff a judge advocate who performs in the first instance for that command the duties which will be described herein as those for the department in general; but such field work is ultimately and finally revised in the office of the Judge Advocate General.

The personnel of the office at Washington consists of a Judge Advocate General with the rank of major general, 1 assistant with the rank of brigadier general, and 20 other assistants of lower grades. Immediately upon the outbreak of war the bureau was reorganized for the purpose of meeting the war demands into the following divisions and duties:

1. The executive division, the function of which is the superintendence of the general administration of the bureau. Its chief must have an intimate knowledge of the working of all the divisions, that he may advise the head of the office regarding them.

2. Military justice, which attends to the review of records of courts-martial, renders reports upon applications for clemency, addresses itself to the problems of the disciplinary barracks and military prison, and all matters having to do with the discipline of the Army.

3. War law. The duty of this division is to collect all war laws and decisions affecting or of interest to our establishment and distribute so much of such matter to judge advocates in the field as would be helpful to them.

4. Titles, accounts, claims, and fiscal affairs: The duties of this division will be to give consideration to accounts, claims, expenditures, disbursements of fiscal affairs in general; contracts, leases, and questions of military reservations and public property.

5. Constitutional law: This division has to do with the consideration of the questions falling under these two special branches of the law, including the law of war.

6. Legislative drafting: The duty of this division is to keep in touch with all pending legislation in Congress and draft all legislation proposed by the department and all regulations and orders submitted to the office.

7. General administration division, which gives attention to the numerous miscellaneous questions arising in the administration of the War Department in the Army, which do not fall specifically within the duties of any other division.

8. Civil administration division: The officer in charge of this division is counsel for the Bureau of Insular Affairs, the Philippine Government, and the Government of Porto Rico. It is the duty of the division to give consideration to all legal questions submitted by the Insular Bureau and involving insular questions and to all questions arising under the civil jurisdiction of the War Department, including river and harbor administration, reservations, and all litigation in the department, the Army, or any of its officers.

9. Personnel and property division: This division is charged with the funds, records, supplies, property, and clerical force of the office and routine business of the bureau.

Each of these divisions, except the one last named, is presided over by a senior commissioned officer who is aided by the necessary number of assistants.

An idea of the great growth of the work to be performed by this bureau may be fairly indicated by comparing the present conditions with those obtaining immediately before the war. Then there were 13 officers in the department; now there are nearly 200. Then there were in the bureau at Washington 4 officers; there are now 30 officers. Then the Army consisted of less than 100,000; now of 1,500,000. The annual appropriation and expenditures which was then in the millions, to-day reaches into the billions. The volume of work of this department is easily 10 times more than it was before war began. The war has given rise to questions involving a sui generis nature. These questions grow out of an exercise of war power, and give rise to questions which few, if any, ever contemplated; and in this field there are few judicial decisions to guide us. Military activity has now touched every other activity in the land. Neither the legal phase of this contact nor the formula for guiding it are clear. Persons and property are subject to jurisdiction which, in this country at least, is not well defined or understood. Fundamental rights are involved; military jurisdiction is to be exercised with care and caution; yet, with cautious regard which must be exercised with certainty and sureness. This office has called to its aid some of the most distinguished lawyers of the country. They are continuously engaged, not only in the usual opinion writing, but they must stand ready day and night to administer what, by proper analogy, may be termed first aid to the legally wounded. Scores of requests for advice of counsel from the world over reach this office daily and must find response without that time for reflection which should, and normally does, characterize the giving of legal advice.

Not only does this bureau advise and counsel individual members of the Military Establishment in the performance of their duties, but, looked at in the aggregate and in a fundamental way, it is the immediate legal agency whereby the Military Establishment itself is kept subordinate to the civil principles of government and all of its activities kept conformable to the law of the land. The above indicates in a general way the duties of this bureau as the legal department of the Army.

But it is as a bureau of military justice that the functions of the department touch personally and individually each offense and enlisted man of the establishment. The rights, duties, and obligations of all military persons are established and regulated by a military code consisting of both written and unwritten law. A member of the establishment is required to conform not only to this special code, but also to the general law of the land, and such conformity may in a general way be designated as discipline. Discipline is maintained in the last analysis by the exertion of military power through regularly established military tribunals which function in accordance with a penal code, technically known as the Articles of War. This code is enacted by Congress under its power to make rules and regulations for the government of the Army. An offender against it is charged, arrested, tried, sentenced and punished in strict accord with the articles. The code is a complete code of penal law, both substantive and adjective. Discipline must be maintained in strict accordance with the code, and with justice.

The process of every case tried by court-martial must be accurately and completely recorded and forwarded to the office of the Judge Advocate General for review, but authority makes necessary revision in order that justice may be done every accused man. All human tribunals are imperfect and especially if it will be the military tribunals of our newly created Army. The officers sitting the court have not been experienced in the school of war and in military law, but have only recently come from civil life. Besides, this is the first democratic Army that America has ever raised. Its members come from the fields and factories; from every class of society, and from every walk of life. Both officers and men alike are untrained to military methods and requirements. The spirit of such an army is bound to be of the highest quality, notwithstanding there will be abundant opportunity for the exercise of authority upon the part of those who have it, and for numerous infractions of discipline upon the part of men who have had no opportunity to acquire the necessary appreciation of discipline. Courts-martial may be expected to be rather frequent and errors in procedure numerous. The review enjoined by law to be carried out in the office of the Judge Advocate General must be made with all the more cautious regard for the rights of individuals so strangely circumstanced in a military organization. This the people will demand; this in justice to the Army and to the individuals thereof this office must do; and this this office is equipped to do.

R. K. SPILLER,
Lieutenant Colonel, Judge Advocate,

No. 2263—Confidential.

From: Headquarters American Expeditionary Forces.

To: The Adjutant General, Washington.

Reference confidential cablegram 360, transmitted to these headquarters from London on March 18, was referred to Maj. Gen. John Biddle. His reply is as follows:

"My recollection is that memorandum was presented to me by Ansell in person after having been shown Secretary of War. I do not remember the details of conversation with him, but was directed by Secretary of War to publish the order. After a few days it was found that order did not give satisfactory results and cancellation was desired. I am certain that all action taken by me was with the knowledge of Maj. Gen. Enoch H. Crowder and by direction of Secretary of War. I do not remember discussing the memorandum with Maj. Gen. Enoch H. Crowder, but clearly understood it had his sanction. I recollect positively that I discussed the cancellation with him. Without having the memorandum at hand it is hard to recall all circumstances. Biddle."

EXHIBIT 159.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL,
Washington, August 13, 1918.

Memorandum for Col. Read:

Subject: Designation of place of confinement under long-term sentences.

1. Col. Davis has prepared a separate memorandum for Gen. Ansell, dated August 1, 1918, on the subject of "Designation of the place of confinement by the reviewing authority," which you have referred to me for examination and comment.

2. In it he withholds concurrence, in an accompanying joint memorandum of the same date for Gen. Ansell, upon the subject of confinement of general prisoners in France, saying: "I do not concede that this office was not advised of what was, in effect, a change in the provisions of the manual with respect to the designation of the Disciplinary Barracks as the place of confinement. On the contrary, this office originated and suggested the change."

The memorandum then reviews the course of some suggestions and recommendations originating in this office respecting sentences for long terms of confinement, particularly, in regard to an accompanying dishonorable discharge; and which resulted in the following confidential instructions to the service by direction of the Secretary of War on December 22, 1917:

"Division and other commanders are expected to make themselves strictly responsible for the discipline of their commands, and these officers, together with general courts-martial and judge advocates, should give close scrutiny to all cases coming before them with a view of being able to pass intelligently upon them and so to measure the punishment to the offense that the following conditions will obtain:

"(a) No sentence of dishonorable discharge will be given where the offender has within him the capacity for military service and when any other appropriate form of punishment is sufficient to meet the requirements of the case.

"(b) Whenever a sentence of dishonorable discharge is given, it should be accompanied with a long term of confinement in the penitentiary or in the Disciplinary Barracks. When the offense is not sufficiently grave to warrant a long term of confinement, it should be assumed that the offender has within him the elements of military service, and he should be made to serve.

"(c) When a sentence of dishonorable discharge is given, unaccompanied with a long period of confinement, reviewing authorities should, in general, suspend or remit the dishonorable discharge and hold the offender to service and punishment with the organization to which he belongs."

It will be observed (1) the instructions make no discrimination between general prisoners in France and in this country, and (2) it is only "when a sentence of dishonorable discharge is given, unaccompanied with a long period of confinement," that "the reviewing authority should, in general, suspend or remit the dishonorable discharge and hold the offender to service and punishment with the organization to which he belongs." The instructions do not contain anything to indicate a change in the policy of the War Department that general prisoners, under sentences of long terms of confinement, should be confined either in the penitentiary or in the Disciplinary Barracks. On the contrary, paragraph (b) expressly provides that this course be followed.

The question giving most concern is what shall be deemed a "long period of confinement." It may be conceded that the instructions contemplated a longer term than the period of six months provided for in the manual; and it may also be assumed that it was intended to allow some discretion to division and other commanders in the matter of determining, in particular cases, what should constitute the long period of confinement required to send a general prisoner to a penitentiary or to the Disciplinary Barracks. The memorandum in reference calls attention to a letter from this office to the judge advocate of the Eastern Department, under date of February 11, 1908, which, while "declining to express an opinion as to the proper duration of this term * * *," said, referring to a suggestion that one year be fixed as the period, if "you have erred in either direction, the term as fixed by you is too short, in the opinion of this office, rather than too long." This letter was written by Col. Davis, signed by Gen. Crowder, and a copy sent February 16, 1918, to all department and division judge advocates. From it an inference may be drawn that the interpretation (therein) by this office of the instructions of December, 1917, was that reviewing authorities were given discretion as to the places of confinement to be designated for prisoners under sentence of dishonorable discharge with periods of confinement of as much as one year; and to that extent, at least, the requirements of paragraphs 397 and 398 of the Manual for Courts-Martial, 1917, were modified by the instructions of December, 1917, above referred to.

What has been said above, however, affords little assistance in determining what course should be pursued in regard to sentences that include dishonorable discharge and full forfeiture, with terms of confinement of from three to five years, such as were involved in the French cases that brought up the present question.

The French cases, may, however, be laid aside, conceding that the cablegram to Gen. Pershing, April 6, 1918, referred to in the papers in reference, made an exception as to those cases and gave to the reviewing officers in Europe an unlimited discretion to retain for punishment prisoners tried and convicted there, regardless of the length of the periods of confinement. It may be observed, however, that the memorandum in reference points to no record evidence that this office was advised of the contents of that cablegram prior to the time of the present investigations, and the fact that it was deemed necessary by Gen. Pershing to ask for, and by the War Department to issue, this special authority as to prisoners in France, would show that the previous policy of the War Department, as reflected in the provisions of the Manual and in the instructions of December 22, 1917, did not authorize the action desired to be taken in France in respect of general prisoners there. Paragraph (b) of the confidential instructions of December 22, 1917, requires that prisoners under sentence of dishonorable discharge, accompanied with a long term of confinement, be confined "in the penitentiary or in the disciplinary barracks"; while the cablegram to Gen. Pershing authorized that such prisoners who would otherwise be confined in disciplinary barracks be retained in Europe.

It may be that this authorization was pursuant to the general policy first suggested by this office, yet that fact does not carry with it the imputation of knowledge to this office that pursuant to that policy this special provision had been authorized as to general prisoners in France. It will further be observed that the cablegram to Gen. Pershing was expressly limited in its application to prisoners in France "who would otherwise be confined in the disciplinary barracks." As is clear from its terms the language used carries the inference that such prisoners in this country should be sent to the disciplinary barracks, and brings us back to what is really the question to be definitely determined, which is: what constitutes such a "long period of confinement" accompanied with dishonorable discharge as to require the sending of prisoners in this country to the disciplinary barracks and depriving the reviewing authority of the discretion to retain such prisoners for confinement and punishment at a post, station, or camp. In support of the contention advanced in the memorandum in reference that the instructions of December 22, 1917, suspended for the period of the war the provisions of the Manual requiring confinement in the disciplinary barracks in all cases where the sentence imposed exceeded six months, reference is made to the letter of February 11, 1918, which scarcely goes further than to say that reviewing authorities were thereby given an enlarged discretion in the matter, and that a period of one year is too short to be regarded as a "long term period of confinement." What, then, as to a period of, say, five years, imposed upon a soldier in this country, with full forfeitures and dishonorable discharge? Shall he be kept at a post guardhouse, without even his allowances to take care of pressing needs?

On January 17, 1918, the following letter to the judge advocate of the Southern Department, was written by Col. Davis, signed by Gen. Crowder, and a copy sent to the judge advocate of each general court-martial jurisdiction:

"1. I am just in receipt of your letter of the 10th instant, in which you discuss the above subject, apparently upon the assumption that, under recent instructions from the War Department, soldiers serving sentences of confinement, but retained with their organizations, are intended to be kept in post or camp guardhouses, under the old custom and be thus removed from military training and discipline during the time they are undergoing sentence. Nothing could be further from the fact as I understand it. It is my understanding that the instructions referred to contemplate that a soldier sentenced to serve punishment shall be required to attend drills and to perform military duty generally, in so far as this is considered safe and advisable, and that the hard labor feature of the sentence shall be applied during hours when other soldiers are off duty, thus insuring that military punishment will not result in a relaxation of discipline or a cessation of military training. The very purpose, I might add, of these instructions is to provide that enlisted men undergoing punishment shall be held with the colors and their training for service be made continuous, in order that the man-power involved may be saved to the country and not be frittered away through confinement and detachment from training and service, except in cases where offenders are of that character that they have not within them the capacity for efficient military service, or their offenses involve such a measure of moral turpitude that imprisonment at hard labor for a long period is the only adequate punishment."

The policy outlined in this letter, if consistently carried out, would remove some of the objections to the service in garrison prisons of sentences in excess of six months, but with the execution of this policy, should go the saving to the prisoner of at least some part of his pay or allowances to meet those personal needs but which are not provided for at his station, as is the case with prisoners in a penitentiary or the disciplinary barracks.

3. Soon after I came on duty, in May, 1918, observing that some reviewing authorities were not respecting the provisions of the Manual in regard to the class of cases under consideration, I brought the matter to the attention of Lieut. Col. Spiller and asked for instructions, and was directed to hold the cases under consideration; and, pending this, was directed later to make a draft of a memorandum to The Adjutant General, drawing attention to the question raised by these records, and asking for instructions from the War Department. This I did, and the memorandum redrafted by Maj. E. M. Morgan, was under date of June 18, 1918, sent to The Adjutant General (J. A. G. O., 250.3—Place of confinement). A copy of that memorandum, together with a copy of the only acknowledgment and reply from the office of The Adjutant General, dated June 21, 1918, is hereto attached. Shortly thereafter I was instructed by Lieut. Col. Spiller, and have more recently been explicitly directed by Col. Mayes, to apply the provisions of the Manual to the class of cases in question, and also to apply in the review of such cases in this office, the general limitations of Article III of the Executive Order of December 15, 1916, Manual for Courts-Martial, page 167, it being recognized that, while these general limitations are not legally binding upon reviewing authorities, they reflect the policy of the War Department, in respect of the matters set out therein. This course has been followed for the past month, in reviewing the "retained in service" records that have come to Room 597, and it may be pertinent to note that, until these provisions of the Manual were applied to the cases from France, none was returned from The Adjutant General's Office with an indorsement showing declination to concur in the recommendations of this office. From this course of action it may be inferred that the requirements in the Manual reflected the policy which the War Department desired should be observed by this office.

More recently there have been returned from the office of The Adjutant General to this office for further comment, two cases which that office had pursuant to recommendations from this office, referred to commanding generals "for the necessary action," and which were returned by them, with indorsements inviting attention to the facts of the particular case and requesting further instructions. In one of these cases, C. M. No. 115350—Floyd—Confinement "at hard labor for two years and forfeiture of two-thirds pay per month for a like period" was imposed and ordered to "be executed at the station of his command." This office recommended "that so much of the sentence * * * as is in excess of six months and forfeiture of pay as imposed for a like period be remitted." The commanding general, in returning the record for further instructions, quoted from the letter from this office of July 11, 1918, the paragraph which expressed the opinion that one year should be considered too short for periods of long confinement, from which, this particular commanding officer concluded, that the two-year terms imposed, in the cases referred to "meets the requirements of the above quoted paragraph."

In the other case, so returned, C. M. 117138—Carter, a sentence of "confinement for six months and reduction to ranks" was imposed and the station of his command designated as the place of confinement. This office recommended that, because of the failure to include hard labor and some forfeiture of pay in the sentence, "the unexecuted portion of the sentence imposed in this case in excess of the reduction to ranks, be remitted." The indorsement of the commanding general called attention to the thirty-seventh article of war giving him authority "to require hard labor as part of the punishment in any case where it is authorized by the Executive order prescribing maximum punishment," notwithstanding the omission of the words "hard labor" in any sentence of a court-martial adjudging imprisonment or confinement, and further called attention to the particular facts of the case showing allotments and extenuating circumstances tending to justify the failure of the court to impose any forfeiture of pay.

A letter to this office from the division judge advocate of the Thirty-first Division, dated August 5, 1918, directs attention to the recommendation of this office, in the case of Pvt. Roscoe Floyd, C. M. No. 115350, above referred to, to the letter of February 11, 1918, and states that after conference with the "commanding general" two years has been fixed as the time which should constitute a "long period of confinement," and that between February 11 and June 22, 1918, 31 cases had been forwarded from his office to this office where the period of confinement was in excess of six months, that 12 additional such cases had been so forwarded since June 22, 1918, that his office holds 10 more such cases awaiting reply from letter of the commanding general to The Adjutant General of the Army, dated July 20, 1918, and concludes with the inquiries (a), "Is it the policy of the War Department that dishonorable discharge should accompany all sentences of more than six months?" * * * and (b), "In the 10 cases now held in this office should that portion of each sentence in excess of six months be remitted before the records are forwarded to Washington?"

The perplexity which confronts the judge advocate of the Thirty-first Division, and the course taken by the two cases returned to this office last above referred to, illustrate the importance of having reduced to definite form the requirements and policies that the War Department desires to be observed both by courts-martial and by the Judge Advocate General's Department; as well as of having those requirements together with a statement of such policies specified in the Manual for Courts-Martial and so insure their systematic and permanent distribution to the rapidly expanding forces of the Army.

The records of trials coming to this office show a steadily increasing divergence from anything approaching uniformity in the apprehension or interpretation of the instructions from the office of The Adjutant General or from this office, and some of these records disclose that the courts trying the cases apparently did not know of the instructions or orders effecting the changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial.

It will be noted that the memorandum of June 18, 1918, from this office, for the Adjutant General, citing the requirements of section 397 of the Manual for Courts-Martial that confinement be executed in a disciplinary barracks, or one of its branches, in cases where confinement for six months or more is imposed, and, where the confinement is not to be executed in a penitentiary, states: "This office knows of no instruction of the War Department modifying this requirement." That memorandum of June 18, 1918, made no reference to the confidential instruction of December 22, 1917, for which failure I was responsible, and the memorandum in reference of August 1, 1918, makes no reference to the memorandum of June 18, 1918, nor to the reply thereto from the office of The Adjutant General dated June 21, 1918.

The memorandum of June 18, 1918, referred to some suggestions made and considered for modifications of the requirements of section 397, and suggested that the end in view "might be accomplished by announcing to the service, through amendments to paragraphs 340 and 397 of the manual, the course to be followed was thus clearly indicated that it was the view of this office that such changes, if made, should be put into effect through amendment of the manual." The memorandum concluded with a request that this office "be advised whether the War Department has formulated, or has in contemplation, the formulation of any policy with reference to the above matter, and whether compliance with the requirements of section 397, Manual for Courts-Martial, is to be insisted upon. This information is necessary to enable officers reviewing records of trial in courts-martial cases to properly dispose of cases of the class above mentioned." In the reply from The Adjutant General of June 21, 1918, this office was informed: "No statement can be made at this time as to the future policy of the War Department with respect to the designation of places of confinement of general prisoners."

4. In July, 1918, there was referred to this office, from the office of the Adjutant General, an inquiry from the commandant of the United States Disciplinary Barracks, Fort Leavenworth, Kans., requesting information as to tion should be made by him of a soldier sentenced to be confined for one year and six months and to forfeit all pay and allowances to become due, without dishonorable discharge, where the United States Disciplinary Barracks, Fort Leavenworth, Kans., had been designated as the place of confinement. The indorsement from this office, written by Lieut. Col. Weeks and signed by me, referred to paragraphs 397 and 398, Manual for Courts-Martial, 1917, expressed, "The opinion of this office that prisoners not sentenced to dishonorable discharge should be held with their organization * * *." In connection with this action it should be noted that, in the opinion of this office, a soldier sentenced to confinement at hard labor for more than six months should be accompanied by some forfeiture of pay." In conclusion, it was expressed that there was no objection to granting the commitment to the United States Disciplinary Barracks, the authority requested, to hold any soldier and other such soldiers under sentence without dishonorable discharge at the stations of their commands for confinement. (J. A. G. O., 8, 253 Misc.)

An executive order of December 15, 1916, prescribing the maximum term of peace of punishment of soldiers, has been held by this office to be operative in time of war, except as to Articles V and VIII thereof. This is given in a letter from this office to the judge advocate of the 1st Division, Camp Meade, Md., dated February 20, 1918. (J. A. G. O., 8, 253 Misc.)

In that letter it was said:

"The question in your communication is, which articles of the Executive Order of December 15, 1916, are now operative? You are advised that Articles V and VIII are operative and that the other articles are inoperative. The War Department in this regard is stated in the following telegram sent out on June 20, or June 21, 1917:

THE JOINT CHIEFS OF STAFF,
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TO THE GENERAL, SOUTHERN DEPARTMENT,
FORT SAM HOUSTON, TEX.

"Articles V and VIII, Executive order, remain effective, but except for these articles the Executive order ceased to be effective upon declaration of war.

" 'McCain.' "

Article III, defining the general limitations of sentences, is not now binding upon courts-martial or reviewing authorities, but if it is suggested that these general limitations, as set out in this article, do not reflect the policy of the War Department, as carried into execution through the exercise of the authority of remission, it is highly desirable that some definite policy in respect of the general limitations to be observed in respect of the matters mentioned in this article, should be formulated for application by this office, in the review of records of trial by general courts-martial unless the War Department desired to allow to reviewing authorities an unfettered discretion. The course last mentioned would not tend to uniformity in the administration of justice in the Army courts.

The Army appropriation bill, approved July 9, 1918, amended the fifty-third article of war, "so that the authority competent to order the execution of the sentence of a court-martial may, at the time of approval of the sentence, suspend the execution, in whole or in part, of any such sentence which extends to death, and may restore the person, under sentence, to the full enjoyment of his civil rights, or may remit, in whole or in part, such suspension, a sentence, or any part thereof may be remitted, in part, except in cases of persons confined in the United States Disciplinary Barracks, or its branches, by the officer who suspended the same, or by any officer exercising appropriate court-martial jurisdiction over the command in which the person under sentence may be held at the time, and, subject to the said exceptions, the same authority may suspend the order of suspension at any time and order the execution of the sentence, in whole or in part, or the suspended part thereof, in so far as the same shall not have been previously remitted." It will be observed that this amendment very largely reserves the discretion and power of commanding officers in the matter of the execution of sentences, and may be taken to reflect a policy of allowing a larger discretion to such officers in respect of administering punishments. Nevertheless, it appears wise, as a matter of policy and in the interests of uniformity, to prescribe some limits for such discretion. It is highly important that any such limitations or other changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial should be made specifically as changes in the manual and promulgated as such, in order that they may have the widest possible systematic distribution to the service in a readily and permanently accessible form, thus keeping the manual complete, as far as practicable, as a guide for military officers and tribunals.

7. Summarizing, it is found that on November 29, 1916, the War Department promulgated the Manual for Courts-Martial for the information and guidance of all concerned, the provisions of this manual being ordered effective on and after March 1, 1917. The declaration of war in April, 1917, rendered inoperative, until the return of peace, the maximum limitations of punishment set out in the Executive order of December 15, 1916, and published in the manual; but Articles V and VIII of the said Executive order remained in full effect while Article III, general limitations, has been observed as reflecting a policy of the War Department until changed.

On December 22, 1917, confidential instructions were issued to the service, by direction of the Secretary of War, for the purpose of discouraging the awarding of dishonorable discharges where the offender has within him the capacity for military service, but provided that a sentence of dishonorable discharge should be accompanied with a long term of confinement in the penitentiary or in the disciplinary barracks; and when a sentence of dishonorable discharge is unaccompanied by a long period of confinement, the dishonorable discharge should be suspended or remitted, and the offender held for service and punishment with his organization. It has been inferred from the language used in these instructions that the period of six months, contemplated by section 397 of the Manual for Courts-Martial, 1917, as the minimum long-term period that should be accompanied by dishonorable discharge, was intended to be lengthened; but no authoritative statement has come from the War Department indicating what shall be considered a long period of confinement within the intentment of the confidential instructions. A letter from the office of the Judge Advocate General, dated February 11, 1918, declines to give an opinion as to what should be considered such a long period of confinement except to say that one year is too short rather than too long for such a period. These confidential instructions have been interpreted by some commanders and others to change by inference the requirements of the manual and the custom of the service that general prisoners, having terms in excess of six months, should not be required to serve them at a post, station, or camp.

On June 18, 1918, this office addressed a memorandum to the Adjutant General, requesting instructions as to the policy that the War Department might wish to be followed in the review of records in respect to the place of confinement, and was advised, under date of June 21, 1918, by the office of The Adjutant General of the Army, that "no statement can be made at this time as to the future policy of the War Department with respect to the designation of places of confinement of general prisoners."

The present state of the law and procedure in the cases under consideration appears to be, having due regard to the Manual for Courts-Martial and the ruling of this office, that the provisions of the former and the customs of the service not in conflict therewith, are to be observed except (a) as to prisoners in France by the terms of the cablegram of April 6, 1918, to Gen. Pershing—"all prisoners who would otherwise be confined in disciplinary barracks (may) be retained in Europe." (b) By the terms of the confidential instructions the provisions of paragraph 397 of the Manual for Courts-Martial, 1917, conflicting therewith, only sentences of dishonorable discharge accompanied with a long period of confinement not to be served in a penitentiary, may, and should, be served in the disciplinary barracks, except as to prisoners in Europe.

The opinion of this office, as reflected in the letter of February 11, 1918, is that a term of confinement must be in excess of one year to warrant its being regarded as a "long period of confinement."

(c) The Executive order of December 15, 1917, is not in force in time of war except as to Articles V and VIII thereof, and except that the general limitations set out in Article III thereof, while not mandatory in time of war, may be observed as reflecting a policy of the War Department, as may also the custom of the service that a sentence involving confinement for more than one month should not be approved unless accompanied by some forfeiture of pay which may also be gathered from the acceptance by the War Department of the recommendations from this office made in the light of the general limitations and custom referred to.

8. The suggested changes in the Manual for Courts-Martial would involve changes in paragraph 311 thereof, as changed January 31, 1918 (C. M. C. M. No. 3, Jan. 31, 1918), and in paragraph 397.

If paragraph 311 is to be changed, it is suggested that it be also so changed in the matter of forfeitures affecting allotments as to conform to the comptroller's decision of April 23, 1918, in respect thereto.

If such changes are to be made it is suggested that the following forms be considered:

Paragraph 311, and the note thereto, to be as follows:

"311. Sentences for soldiers.—For soldiers, the legal sentences, depending on the nature of the offense and the jurisdiction of the court, include death, dishonorable discharge, confinement at hard labor, hard labor without confinement, forfeiture of pay, detention of pay, and reprimand; for noncommissioned officers, reduction to the ranks, for privates, first class, reduction to second-class privates and privates; for cooks of the Quartermaster Corps (where sentence is imposed by a general court-martial), reduction to the ranks; and for those holding a certificate of eligibility to promotion, deprivation of all rights and privileges arising from such a certificate. That portion of pay which is required to be allotted to dependent relatives of class A under the provisions of Article II of the war-risk insurance act of October 6, 1917, and that portion allotted to dependents of class B under the same act, Liberty loan allotments, and premiums on war-risk insurance are not subject to be forfeited by sentence of courts-martial. A sentence imposing forfeiture of a part of pay means the forfeiture of the specified part of that portion of the pay which is not so allotted.

"NOTE.—1. Confinement without hard labor should never be imposed.

"2. Sentences involving confinement for more than one month should include some forfeiture of pay.

"3. A sentence that does not include dishonorable discharge should not forfeit allowances and should specify such part of the pay as may be forfeited thereby in proportional parts of such pay per month and not in specified amounts.

"4. No sentence of dishonorable discharge should be imposed (a) where the offender has within him the capacity for military service; (b) where any other form of punishment is sufficient to meet the requirements of the particular case; (c) where the period of confinement is less than 18 months.

"5. A court should not by a single sentence, which does not include dishonorable discharge, adjudge against a soldier:

"(a) Forfeiture of pay at a rate greater than two-thirds of his pay per month.

"(b) Forfeiture of pay in an amount greater than two-thirds of his pay for 18 months.

"(c) Confinement at hard labor for a period greater than 18 months.

"6. A court should not, by a single sentence, adjudge against a soldier:

"(a) Detention of pay at a rate greater than two-thirds of his pay per month.

"(b) Detention of pay in an amount greater than two-thirds of his pay for six months.

"(c) Hard labor without confinement for a period greater than six months.

"7. Where that portion of a sentence that imposes confinement is suspended, or where the portion of a sentence that imposes dishonorable discharge is suspended and the disciplinary barracks is not to be designated as the place of confinement, the portion remaining should be brought within the general limitations above recommended.

"8. Convicted prisoners confined at military posts, stations, camps, or cantonments should be required to attend drills, to perform military duty generally, in so far as is considered safe and advisable, and to perform hard labor during the hours when other soldiers are off duty, to the end that military punishment may not result in a relaxation of discipline nor a cessation of military training.

"9. For forms of sentences see Appendix 9."

Paragraph 397 to be as follows:

"397. When confinement in disciplinary barracks will be directed: The United States Disciplinary Barracks at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., or one of its branches, will be designated as the place of confinement of all general prisoners other than residents of Porto Rico, the Canal Zone, Hawaiian Islands, of the Philippine Islands, and other than general prisoners of any American Expeditionary Forces, who are confined for 18 months or more and who are not to be confined in a penitentiary pursuant to the preceding paragraph. From time to time detailed instructions will be issued as to which of the barracks shall be designated and as to when the prisoners shall be transferred to them."

The adoption of the foregoing and the promulgation thereof as amendments to the manual would tend to make clear what is now in confusion and would supply to the service a uniform guide in terms sufficiently liberal to afford the larger discretion, it is desirable that commanding officers should have in the matters of discipline in their commands, and would at the same time, safeguard the interests of individuals against the caprice or neglect of courts-martial that might, even unthoughtfully, deprive them of such parts of their pay and allowances as are necessary to maintain their self-respect, so long as they shall not have committed offenses warranting their discharge from the service.

The course here suggested would not be out of line with the insistent contention of this office that the man power of the country be conserved through the saving to the service of many soldiers who, under the former practice, would be lost by the too frequent imposition of sentences of dishonorable discharge.

If the service under the confidential instructions of December 22, 1917, is to be released from all restrictions except the individual discretion of reviewing authorities in respect of what should be considered a "long period of confinement," and if the declaration of war has, as it has, rendered inoperative the general limitations of Article III of the Executive order of December 15, 1916, and they are not to be replaced by, at least, some admonitions of the policy of the War Department, in respect of the subject matter of those general limitations, the resulting confusion and lack of uniformity in the result of trials by general courts-martial in the class of cases under consideration will grow beyond all the bounds of an orderly administration of military justice.

On the other hand, it is possible at least to advise, if not to fix except through the power of remission, such limitations upon the discretion given as to hold it within the bounds of wise experience, without depriving it of adaptability to varying conditions in the Army.

9. The rapidly accumulating number of records of cases tried by general courts-martial, reviewed in this office and then laid aside, pending explicit determination and direction from the office of The Adjutant General as to the policy to be observed by this office in making recommendations in the class of cases under consideration, makes it highly important that early consideration be given the questions raised by these records.

10. It is recommended that a memorandum be prepared by this office for The Adjutant General calling attention to the memorandum of June 18, 1918, to the confidential instructions of December 22, 1917, and to the cablegram of April 6, 1918, to Gen. Pershing, referred to, with the request that this office be explicitly advised whether, in reviewing records of trials by general courts-martial, it shall be guided (1) by the requirements of paragraphs 396, 397, and 398 of the Manual for Courts-Martial, 1917, (2) by the general limitations of Article III of the Executive order of December 15, 1916, Manual for Courts-Martial, 1917, page 167, and (3) what different rules, if any, shall be observed in reviewing records of trials had in Europe.

It is also further recommended that such memorandum to The Adjutant General shall, in the interests of clearness and uniformity, include the suggestion that all amendments and orders which effect changes in provisions of the Manual for Courts-Martial, as now written, be carried into the Manual as formal changes thereof, and that they be promulgated as such changes. If deemed advisable, such changes might be limited in operation to the period of the present war.

It is further recommended that such memorandum to The Adjutant General include a suggestion to amend the Manual for Courts-Martial, 1917, as set out in paragraph 8 of this memorandum.

AUBREY E. STRODE,

EXHIBIT 160.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL,
Washington, August 16, 1918.

Memorandum for Gen. Ansell.

Subject: Questions relating to the administration of military discipline; office policy.

1. Recent changes in the assignment of officers in this and The Adjutant General's Office has developed the fact that our own office has suffered from a lack of a formulated and expressed policy which should govern in the disposition of cases wherein actions of courts and of reviewing authorities seem to vary in some particulars from the strict requirements of the Manual for Courts-Martial. Doubtless, in the eyes of the service, our office has shown a lack of continuity in its policy and instructions from time to time. This has given rise to confusion and uncertainty, both here and in the field. It is the belief of your committee that this should now be eliminated in so far as possible by an approved statement of the views and policies of this office which may hereafter be intelligently followed by anyone who may hereafter handle the work of the disciplinary division of this office.

2. In order to present this situation clearly to your mind it is necessary briefly to review events leading up to the promulgation of certain confidential instructions to reviewing authorities that were sent out by the direction of the Secretary of War under date of December 22, 1917. In October, 1917, this office began an agitation of the question of the form of punishments which are proper during time of war. On October 18, 1917, you wrote a memorandum for the Chief of Staff in which you invited attention to the fact that under the existing system of punishment a great many men would be withdrawn from actual service and you stated it as your opinion that "the department should now take some means of preventing, or at least controlling, discharges from the service as a result of court-martial punishment."

You stated further that it was your view that "disciplinary or penal battalions ought to be organized under the control of the division commander, and to these penal battalions military offenders should, except, perhaps, in rare instances, be sentenced to serve, and while therein they should be made to serve not only as soldiers but under such conditions as would involve punishment."

You also stated: "Doubtless there are rare instances where men must be taken out of the Army entirely and subjected to long term of imprisonment, but I think they must be rare. As I see it, the department has the responsibility of deciding how it can utilize the services of these soldiers and at the same time keep them within a penal condition."

Under date of November 14, 1917, you signed a memorandum on the same subject which was prepared by your direction in which it was pointed out that the action suggested in your memorandum of October 18, 1918, had been "confused with the plan heretofore suggested, by Maj. King of the Medical Corps, of establishing disciplinary battalions at the various cantonments."

Your memorandum of October 18, 1917, was referred, in connection with other papers bearing upon this subject, including the papers having to do with the establishment of disciplinary battalions in the various divisions, to the War College for study, and a conclusion was reached which served as a basis for a memorandum from the Acting Chief of Staff to The Adjutant General in which it was stated that "the Secretary of War directs that the papers herewith regarding the above matter (disciplinary battalions for divisional camps and cantonments) be filed without further action."

The memorandum from the Acting Chief of Staff then recited that the Secretary of War had directed that certain confidential instructions be given for the information and guidance of all department, division, and organization commanders, general courts-martial, and judge advocates. These instructions are quoted in paragraph 2 of the memorandum of this office under date of November 14, 1917. The purpose of the memorandum of this office under date of November 14 was to secure a reconsideration of the form in which it was proposed to convey these confidential instructions to the service, and it was pointed out that they did not meet the requirements of the case. Among other things this department said:

"Wholly regardless of the advisability of authorizing at this time such construction as may be necessary to take care of prisoners held at division camps and wholly regardless of whether disciplinary battalions, as that term is generally understood, should be organized at this time, the necessity of discontinuing the practice of dishonorably discharging men for light offenses is clearly manifest and calls for quick action. In a great majority of the cases now arising a dishonorable discharge is not only unnecessary but futile and inappropriate. Men sentenced to be dishonorably discharged, who have within them the elements of service, should still be made to serve, and to accomplish this end the dishonorable discharge should be remitted or suspended in their cases and they should be held for training and service with their divisions. Such sentences as it is necessary to impose upon them can ordinarily be worked out in their commands, and the cases will be few in which it is necessary to remove them from their commands and confine them in a penitentiary or disciplinary barracks."

In the memorandum of November 14, 1917, this office concluded with the recommendation that the confidential instructions to be issued to the service should be in pertinent part as follows:

"Division and other commanders are expected to make themselves strictly responsible for the discipline of their commands, and these officers, together with general courts-martial and judge advocates, should give close scrutiny to all cases coming before them with a view of being able to pass intelligently upon them and so to measure the punishment to the offense that the following conditions will obtain:

"(a) No sentence of dishonorable discharge will be given where the offender has within him the capacity for military service and when any other appropriate form of punishment is sufficient to meet the requirements of the case.

"(b) Whenever a sentence of dishonorable discharge is given, it should be accompanied with a long term of confinement in the penitentiary or in the disciplinary barracks. Where the offense is not sufficiently grave to warrant a long term of confinement, it should be assumed that the offender has within him the elements of military service, and he should be made to serve.

"(c) When a sentence of dishonorable discharge is given, unaccompanied with a long period of confinement, reviewing authorities should, in general, suspend or remit the dishonorable discharge and hold the offender to service and punishment with the organization to which he belongs."

These instructions as formulated by this office were promulgated by the Secretary of War under date of December 22, 1917, in the form of confidential instructions to the service. These instructions are in conflict with paragraphs 396, 397, and 398 of the Manual for Courts-Martial. They were interpreted by reviewing authorities to mean that the provisions of the Manual requiring confinement in the disciplinary barracks in all cases where confinement in excess of six months had been approved were suspended for the period of the war. Immediately thereafter reviewing authorities began designating the station of the soldier's command as the place of confinement in all cases where it was believed that the soldier had within him the elements of service and in which it was not believed advisable to impose confinement in a penal institute. The question which gave the service most concern was that which naturally arose as to the meaning to be given to the phrase "a long term of confinement" as used in these instructions. In several cases this office was asked to place an authoritative construction upon these words. It declined to do so on the ground that this was a matter which had been committed to the discretion of department and division commanders.

In a letter to the judge advocate of the Eastern Department, under date of February 11, 1918, this office wrote as follows:

"What shall constitute a 'long period of confinement' within the meaning of that term as used in the instructions referred to? This office has received several requests for an unofficial expression of its views as to the meaning to be attributed to this expression. You state in paragraph 8 of your letter that you have fixed one year as the period. In declining to express an opinion as to the proper duration of this term, this office has remarked that the purpose of these instructions was to place responsibility for discipline as completely as possible in the hands of department and division commanders, subject to the general instructions that dishonorable discharges should be reduced in number and that offenders should be held for service with their organizations and for the continuance of their training in all cases where this was considered possible. Subject to this general plan each department and division commander was intended to be allowed a free exercise of his own ingenuity and discretion in maintaining discipline without an interruption of training. If you have erred in either direction, the term as fixed by you is too short, in the opinion of this office, rather than too long."

3. Under these instructions, as was naturally to be expected, the administration of military discipline was far from uniform. It varied, as was inevitable, according to the widely differing standards and views of reviewing authorities in the matter of securing discipline through the agencies of military courts. Through it all, however, could be observed certain well-defined results. The idea of conserving man power was adopted and the number of cases sent to the disciplinary barracks was very greatly reduced. Buildings which had been erected at Fort Leavenworth to accommodate the expected increase in the population of the disciplinary barracks remained unoccupied and the commandant of the branch at Alcatraz reported in May of this year that his barrack population was less than it had been in time of peace. Men having within them the elements of service were held for punishment of offenses committed with the organization to which they belonged and were given to understand that the commission of crime would not result in enabling them to escape the burdens and dangers of war. The resulting lack of uniformity in punishment was no greater than was natural to be expected; and it must be remembered that Congress assumed the responsibility for this lack of uniformity when it failed to confer upon the President the right to prescribe limits of punishment which would be applicable in time of war but allowed, instead, courts-martial to impose punishment in their discretion except in the few cases where the punishment is fixed by statute.

Under the system thus established, as administered in this office, a record of trial by court-martial was reviewed with the sole purpose of determining its legality and not with the idea of attempting to enforce any degree of uniformity on the courts in the sentences which they might impose or upon the action of reviewing authorities in passing upon the same. It was recognized that each convening authority would have his own ideas as to the proper methods of securing discipline and that many novel and perhaps seemingly unjust sentences would result. If, however, the sentences were legal and within the spirit of the confidential instructions set out above, the cases were passed to file. In a case where the status of the soldier's command had been designated for a considerable term of confinement and the man held there for training with his organization while undergoing punishment, it was assumed that in the opinion of the reviewing authority the man had within him the elements of service and that it was unnecessary to send him to a penal institution, and, to that extent, to deplete the man power of the country.

While this policy was in effect Col. Davis, of this committee, was in charge of the disciplinary division of this office and Maj. J. S. Jones was in charge of the corresponding work in the office of The Adjutant General. It happened that Col. Davis and Maj. Jones were relieved from duty at their respective desks at about the same time. Col. Read, who succeeded Col. Davis in this office did not know of these confidential instructions which had governed the policy of this office and apparently Maj. Riley, who succeeded Maj. Jones in The Adjutant General's office did not know of them. Not knowing of these instructions, it was but natural for Col. Read, upon assuming charge of the disciplinary division, to revert to the Manual as his guide, which although in part suspended by these confidential instructions, had not, in fact, been formally amended. Col. Mayes seems also not to have been conversant with the spirit of these confidential instructions for the reason that he directed Col. Read to adhere to the provisions of the Manual, suggesting that if the War Department wanted to amend the same, it should regularly do so. As a result of this changed policy this office began to recommend, in cases where the station of the soldiers' command had been designated as the place of confinement for punishment exceeding six months, that the place of confinement be changed to the Disciplinary Barracks in accordance with the literal requirements of the Manual. This was, in effect, an abandonment by this office of its policy of conservation of man power through the holding of men to service for which it had contended and which it had succeeded in getting established in the matter hereinbefore indicated. In several cases the changed recommendations were approved by The Adjutant General's Office and it was not until this office attempted to apply this changed policy to cases arising in the expeditionary forces in France that The Adjutant General's Office declined to follow the recommendations of this office. This may have resulted from the fact that Maj. Riley, who succeeded Maj. Jones in The Adjutant General's office, knew that special authority had been given Gen. Pershing to retain in France prisoners from the expeditionary forces, but may not have known or may have overlooked the confidential instructions communicated to the service under date of December 22, 1917.

4. The foregoing accounts for the conflicting views and attitudes of this office and for the seeming lack of understanding in the office of The Adjutant General as to the proper disposition of the question at issue.

Your committee firmly believes that the policy advocated by this office and established as a result of its insistence was the correct policy. It believes that in time of war division commanders should be charged, as completely as possible, with responsibility for the discipline of their divisions, and that the administration of military punishment should be governed in time of war by the boldly outstanding facts that it is necessary to conserve man power, and that enlisted men should be made to understand that the commission of crime will not necessarily result in interruption of training for military service or escape from the dangers and hardships of war. It believes, moreover, that in carrying out this policy, inequalities and lack of uniformity are bound to result, but that this office can not too much concern itself with these matters if it is not to impose upon the service an unnecessary burden of paper work, and force division commanders to give time and attention to matters of administration which should be given to matters of training and instruction for combat with the enemy. In other words, the administration of this office should conform with war conditions, and sympathetic consideration should always be extended to the efforts of reviewing authorities to carry into practical effect the conservation and training policies which the War Department adopted upon the advice of this office. To accomplish these ends, we must not adhere too rigidly to peace-time standards or require military justice in time of war to be administered according to formulas prescribed by those who are not in touch with actual conditions in the field and who can not be held responsible for the results there attained.

5. In order to readjust this situation and to enable our judge advocates in the field properly to perform their functions, as well as to protect this office against the danger of further inadvertent change of policy and attitude, your committee recommends that the following statement be published in circular form for the information of representatives of this office both here and in the field:

The frequent but necessary shifting of personnel in this office has of late caused temporary misunderstanding and some confusion in enforcing the War Department policy promulgated to the service in the confidential instructions from The Adjutant General's Office under date of December 22, 1917. These instructions are in pertinent part as follows:

"Division and other commanders are expected to make themselves strictly responsible for the discipline of their commands, and these officers, together with general courts-martial and judge advocates, should give close scrutiny to all cases coming before them with a view of being able to pass intelligently upon them, and so to measure the punishment to the offense that the following conditions will obtain:

"(a) No sentence of dishonorable discharge will be given where the offender has within him the capacity for military service and when any other appropriate form of punishment is sufficient to meet the requirements of the case.

"(b) Whenever a sentence of dishonorable discharge is given, it should be accompanied with a long term of confinement in the penitentiary or in the disciplinary barracks. Where the offense is not sufficiently grave to warrant a long term of confinement, it should be assumed that the offender has within him the elements of military service, and he should be made to serve.

"(c) When a sentence of dishonorable discharge is given, unaccompanied with a long period of confinement, reviewing authorities should, in general, suspend or remit the dishonorable discharge and hold the offender to service and punishment with the organization to which he belongs."

As this office interprets these instructions, they amount to a practical suspension during the period of the war of that part of section 397 of the Manual for Courts-Martial which requires the United States Disciplinary Barracks at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., or one of its branches to be "designated as the place of confinement of all prisoners other than residents of Porto Rico, Canal Zone, Hawaiian Islands, or the Philippine Islands who are to be confined for six months or more and who are not to be confined in the penitentiary pursuant to the preceding paragraph."

While heretofore refraining from placing a construction upon the phrase "long period of confinement" as used in the above instructions, this office has indicated that one year should be regarded as the minimum term which should be classed as a long period of confinement. In practical application it is believed that most reviewing authorities have fixed this period at two years, and this office believes that in general that period might well be adopted as the approved limit beyond which confinement must be served in a penal institution rather than at the station of the soldier's command.

This office is further of the opinion that within the limits of an approved sentence of two years' confinement, unless the record shows a high degree of moral turpitude, reviewing authorities should hold offenders to service as well it, by suspending dishonorable discharge and designating the soldier's command as the place of confinement. In so far as possible duty should be required in connection with any sentence and will serve to retain in service those having within them the service, and to emphasize the principle that commission of crime should not be held upon to confer immunity from the hardships and dangers of war without saying that any punishment, over which a reviewing authority has jurisdiction, may properly be mitigated in his discretion. Punishments, such as hard labor without confinement, confinement without forfeiture of pay without confinement, and variations of these should, in the opinion of this office, be judiciously imposed, having in view the results to be accomplished. In any case a reviewing authority should be ready to exercise the powers of remission conferred by the article of war, as amended by the act of July 9, 1918 (Public Law 118, 40th Cong.), whenever the ends of punishment have been attained. In this connection it is proper to remark that this amendment of the fifty-second article of war, suggested by this office, had its inception in the desire to more fully enable reviewing authorities to carry into practical effect the policies of the War Department with reference to conservation of man power and continuity of actual service.

The lack of uniformity in punishments imposed are to be corrected in reviewing cases in this office, only the legality of sentences should be considered. No attempt will be made to secure uniformity of punishment throughout the service in any particular class or classes of offenses by corrective action by the War Department or through attempts to influence the action of courts-martial or reviewing authorities. Congress has empowered courts-martial, in time of war, to impose punishment in their discretion except where the punishment has been prescribed by statute, and it is the duty of such courts at such time to prescribe limits which must be followed. An intelligent application of these views will, it is believed, attain the desired end of uniform punishment and service while at the same time reducing to the minimum the correspondence between this office and reviewing authorities, or between this office and that of The Adjutant General, in the final disposition of cases.

Punishments by courts-martial of enlisted men in time of war.

I have read with great interest the two memoranda of Col. Davis and the Major, Judge Advocate, and while I agree with both those officers in certain particulars, I regret to find myself unable to give my assent to the conclusions reached by them and to the proposals they have submitted as solutions, from five points of view, of this most important problem. I have given much thought and consideration to the question of punishments in the Army in time of war, so that the views I entertain were not hastily formed, but are the result of considerable experience, observation, and reflection. I have no sympathy with many of the severe punishments imposed, in time of peace or war. In my judgment, in the vast majority of cases they defeat the very purpose had in view by those who imposed them. It will be generally conceded by those who are qualified to express an opinion on the subject that it is well recognized to-day in every enlightened system of penology that it is the promptness and certainty of punishment, and its severity, which produces the desired disciplinary and reformative effect. A day of punishments savoring of cruelty and vindictiveness has been the lot of civilized countries never to return again. Surely, nothing even suggestive of that sort of thing has any place in the great Army of the United States we are now engaged in raising for the sole and avowed purpose of maintaining the supremacy of right throughout the world simply because it is the right. Harsh and unduly severe punishments are not in harmony with that great ideal. And yet I have on my desk the cases of two young soldiers who were sentenced to 10 years' confinement at hard labor for absence without leave for from four to five days, and the cases of three other young soldiers who were sentenced to 25 years' confinement at hard labor and forfeiture of five-sixths of their pay per month for that period for disobedience of orders. Admittedly, as a general rule, offenses in time of war are more serious than in time of peace and should be more severely punished, but this is not unqualifiedly true. Many offenses, particularly in this country, are no more serious now than before we entered the war, and they should not be more severely dealt with. No one ever contended before the war that there should not be uniformity in punishment wherever and whenever practicable. As a matter of fact, we tried to bring about that very situation, because it was realized, as a matter of common sense and common fairness, that for the same or similar offenses men should receive the same or similar punishment. If that be true—and there does not seem to be any serious fault with the logic—why in time of war, with literally thousands of untrained and inexperienced officers of almost every grade, should we say that because the Executive order is not in force, practically any punishment in the way of forfeiture or confinement will be permitted without question, provided there is no statutory inhibition against it? Good judgment and sound discretion on the part of courts and reviewing authorities, it seems to me, are more necessary in time of war than in time of peace, for obvious reasons. Yet, no one can sit at my desk and note the cases that daily pass across it and fail to observe that these necessary qualities are often conspicuously absent. Sentences are imposed and approved, the severity of which, from my point of view, is so out of proportion to the gravity of the offenses as to render them positively grotesque. The courts are, of course, actuated by the highest motives in imposing such sentences. They think that is the way to enforce discipline; I think they are mistaken. In addition to being the wrong method to accomplish the purpose in view, such sentences create a most unfortunate impression upon the civil community. I am constrained to believe that it would be manifestly inadvisable from every point of view to have the impression get abroad that courts and reviewing authorities in their actions are governed only by an unrestricted discretion. This is truly the people's war, to be fought by the people's Army, and it is but just and right that they should be made to feel that the system of punishments in force in that Army is not based on the judgment, informed or uninformed, of courts, but has its foundation in wise and humane principles that have been thoroughly tested in time of peace.

2. In view of the fact that the Secretary of War has authorized the commander in chief of the American Expeditionary Forces to retain in Europe all prisoners who would otherwise be confined in the disciplinary barracks, my remarks are, of course, addressed to those conditions which obtain within the continental limits of the United States and to the punishments there imposed. I believe that no one will take issue with this action of the Secretary of War. It was the necessary and obvious course to pursue. Indeed, I recommended action of that character when I was in France as judge advocate of the First Division. I realized that it was unwise and impracticable to return to this country for confinement prisoners who ordinarily would be sent to disciplinary barracks. Furthermore, it was well that it be definitely understood that no man would be able to avoid or escape his obligation to serve in France by committing an offense which might secure his return to the United States for confinement in a disciplinary barracks. There are, of course, few such men in our Army. Clearly, in the cases of other men who offended from no such motive, an opportunity should be afforded them there to win restoration to the honorable status of duty.

3. I can not subscribe to the proposition that men under a suspended sentence of dishonorable discharge with or without a short term of confinement should be left with their organizations. It is an anomalous situation with practically nothing to be said in its favor and much to be said in opposition to it. It must be borne in mind that men under a suspended sentence of dishonorable discharge receive neither pay nor allowances. In addition, they would be without means to provide themselves with those necessities which the Government does not provide even to those soldiers who are on a full pay status. I refer, for instance, to such things as laundry, barber expenses, tobacco, etc. It is needless to suggest that to keep men in that condition with troops would result in their becoming chronic borrowers and general nuisances, and, in some instances, petty thieves. The proper place for those men, as well the dishonorable discharge has not been suspended but who are restored to duty, is the disciplinary barracks, or one of its kind. These institutions were established for the specific purpose of confining soldiers under sentence of dishonorable discharge and confinement to their honorable restoration to duty or their reenlistment.

The results of the work accomplished in these institutions have more than justified their establishment. I do not share the fears that have been expressed to the loss of man-power due to sending prisoners to the disciplinary barracks. That loss will be inconsiderable and may be justly negligible when compared with the good results obtained in promptly punishing and disciplining men to the colors.

Then, my opinion is that an announcement should be made to the effect that while the Executive order is limited to a time of confinement, it is believed that the general limitations upon punishments fixed by that order furnish a safe, sane, and conservative guide in time they should not be exceeded or departed from save in exceptional cases. Secondly, that dishonorable discharges should not be imposed except where no less punishment would be adequate and should usually be followed by a long term of confinement, whether the confinement is to be in a disciplinary barracks or in a penitentiary. Thirdly, in all cases where a dishonorable discharge has been imposed and the disciplinary barracks designated as the place of confinement, and there is reason for the belief that the prisoner may be reclaimed to the service, the dishonorable discharge should be suspended. Fourthly, all men sentenced to dishonorable discharge and confinement will, if a penitentiary has not been designated as the place of confinement, be sent to the disciplinary barracks, or one of its kind, whether or not the dishonorable discharge has been suspended.

EXHIBIT 162.

STATEMENT OF SENATOR CHAMBERLAIN IN THE SENATE, JANUARY 3, 1919.

Now, at, I come to another thing, Mr. President, not so much in the way of a suggestion, in the hope that some remedy may be found for the conditions that exist. It is with reference to inequalities in the administration of the law as it affects the soldiers. The administration of military justice during this war has developed many cases of life or long term sentences by court-martial which either would not have been imposed at all or would have been more lenient if the rights of the enlisted man had been properly protected in the course of his trial before the court-martial. Mere boys, some of them hardly possible mentally for their acts, have been adjudged guilty of serious or criminal offenses and sentenced for life or long terms in the court-martial.

Court-martial sentences found by the reviewing authority to be invalid for want of jurisdiction have been allowed to stand, thereby subjecting to legal punishment a man sentenced without justification of law.

A man doing military police duty who entered a shop during the night and according to his own story, he heard a noise which he thought was a burglar, was found in the shop and himself accused of burglary. He was tried by court-martial which tried him found him not guilty. The commanding officer appointed the court disapproved the verdict and "recommended" that the court reconsider the case. The court did "reconsider" and found the man guilty and imposed a long term of imprisonment. The evidence was not substantial. On final review of the record in this case it was recommended that the verdict of guilty be set aside and the man discharged. The commanding officer, disapproving of this recommendation, has allowed the verdict to stand, and the man is now serving his sentence. This case, while it illustrates the control which the military commander exercises in the administration of military justice.

Those cases come to me. I have looked up many of them to verify the facts. Now of a case where a young lieutenant was on a court of inquiry at a certain cantonment - I will not mention where. His commanding officer said "A. B. is charged with crime. He ought to be severely punished. He should be sent up for six months." The young officer, a lawyer, detailed for court-martial duty, looked into the case, and he and his colleagues sentenced this young fellow to five days in the guardhouse. His commanding officer called him up and said: "you know, that is the man whom I told you ought to be severely punished. I see you have only sentenced him for five days in the guardhouse." The lieutenant replied, "That is all that the evidence warranted. It was a very minor offense." "That is the way military law is administered here, is it?" And in a very short time the young officer was removed from that detail, simply because he had not carried out the orders of the commanding officer. What use of a court if a commanding officer is to practically control its actions?

Senators, I am not blaming the Secretary of War for this. I blame him only to this extent: That a word from him would stop such practices.

These individual cases give the human touch to conditions, and in order to impress it upon the attention of the War Department I am just going to call attention to two or three more as illustrative of what is in my mind. I am not going to give the names of the soldiers, either.

A green country boy, a private in the machine-gun company of the One hundred and fifty-sixth Infantry, was tried and convicted of the charge of absence without leave from Camp Beauregard from May 9 to May 15, 1918. That is six days. It was shown in evidence by the prosecution that he had been notified of his selection for overseas duty. The accused testified that he went home to see his mother, probably for the last time, as she was ill in a hospital. He was sentenced to a dishonorable discharge, total forfeitures, and confinement at hard labor for 25 years in a disciplinary barracks.

Now, Senators, I realize the necessity of maintaining discipline. There is not any question about that; but, in God's name, could not a boy like that have been punished a little less severely under the circumstances than 25 years in a prison, where his life in the very nature of things must be ruined?

A similar case is that of a private of Company D, One hundred and fifty-fifth Infantry, who was charged and convicted of absence without leave from May 9 to May 15, 1918—the same period of time—from Camp Beauregard—the same place—after notification of his selection for overseas duty. It was shown that the boy had gone home to his folks in Mississippi to tell them good-by. He was sentenced to dishonorable discharge, total forfeitures, and 15 years' confinement of hard labor in a disciplinary barracks.

You see, there is 10 years' difference between the punishment meted out to these young men in the same place and for the same crime. There may be aggravated circumstances connected with them that I do not know anything about, but I can not conceive how it should have been found necessary to have inflicted such terribly severe punishment. I can understand that if it was on the battle front and a boy had left his post without leave his punishment should be severe, even to sentencing him to be shot.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. He returned voluntarily, did he?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. So I understand.

Now, take another case: A private of Company M, Forty-ninth Infantry, was convicted of sleeping on his post at Camp Merritt, N. J., and was sentenced to a dishonorable discharge, total forfeitures, and 10 years' confinement at hard labor in a disciplinary barracks. You see, there is the same kind of a case, and yet there are 15 years' discrepancy between the punishment meted out to the first soldier, where both crimes committed were practically the same.

Mr. WATSON. Did these men come back of their own accord?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am so informed. If the Senator from Indiana wants, I will give him the names and record, and I will give them to the Secretary of War if he wants them, but I dislike to publish these cases in the Record so that the young men may probably be discredited, because I hope that something will be done to relieve many of these sentences.

Take another case: A private of Company F, Forty-ninth Infantry, was convicted of sleeping on his post at the United States Engineers' Depot, New York City, and was sentenced to dishonorable discharge, total forfeitures, and 10 years' confinement in a disciplinary barracks. He was assigned to what was virtually a watchman's job, and he gets 10 years. I can not conceive why such severe punishment should be meted out to young soldiers for such small crimes. I believe in the strictest military discipline, but it can be accomplished without any such severity as that.

A case somewhat different from these in which the President showed mercy was that of a private of the Third Training Company, casual detachment, who disobedience of orders to drill and of having seditious literature for distribution. He was sentenced to be shot. It appeared a sincere conscientious objector and that he had not been offered service, as provided in General Order No. 28, War Department, 18. He had in his possession some literature in which certain books had been condemned by the Department of Justice, but that department had decided that such books might be retained by members of religious societies for study, and there was no evidence that the accused attempted to distribute these books. His death sentence was disapproved by the President and the prisoner was discharged; and very properly so. I think the President will exercise the same clemency and show the same mercy in other cases, and I believe he will. But I call attention to these cases as showing the inequality of sentences by court-martial in the country; and there is a remedy for it.

The commanding officer's control over the court-martial is such that he may take any action which the court should take.

It is very repugnant to our ideas of the administration of criminal law that a court-martial should have the power to set aside a verdict of acquittal. Nevertheless, it has the power of the commanding officer over a court-martial trial. I think it is wise to give this power not only in the case of military offenses but also in the case of ordinary civil offenses, as, for example, larceny committed by persons who may be sent to court-martial are not definitely defined or limited. The commanding officer may determine what offenses shall be tried by court-martial.

He may, for example, subject to the disgrace of court-martial a soldier who, no matter what the justifying circumstances, has been absent from duty for five days. He may, without any investigation of the circumstances, send a man to trial by court-martial.

In the French Army such a man is not sent to trial until an investigation has determined that the man is guilty of the offense.

With us the commanding officer exercises at all stages a disciplinary control of the administration of military justice. We do not administer military justice according to law; it is constantly under the control of the military commander, who is not obliged either to ask for legal advice or to follow it when he has asked for it and it has been given to him by the law officers of the Army.

It is surprising under the circumstances that there are too many trivial offenses tried by court-martial, too many unduly severe sentences, and too many punishments imposed for like offenses.

Terms for the same offenses imposed by courts-martial during the present war range all the way from imprisonment in the penitentiary to six months confinement in a barracks. Frequently the life term is imposed for an offense for which in other cases a few months imprisonment is imposed.

For the less serious offenses the punishments range from days or months of confinement to a few years' imprisonment. There is no standard of punishment, and the changing personnel of courts-martial, and their lack of familiarity with criminal law makes anything like uniformity of punishment impossible.

If we are to have a democratic army, military justice ought to be administered as it is in other countries, by courts which are constituted, whose jurisdiction is determined and whose action is controlled by law. Courts-martial are required to accept the interpretation of the law by a responsible law officer.

In the same manner that a jury in a civil criminal court accepts the interpretation of the law by the judge of the court. This is not to suggest that military justice should be undermined, but that it should be supported by a fair and impartial system of determining guilt and imposing punishments.

There is no greater obstacle to discipline than the resentment which the soldier feels for arbitrary punishment.

The records of the courts-martial in this war show that we have no military system of administering military justice which is worthy of the name of justice.

We have simply a method of giving effect to the more or less arbitrary discretion of the commanding officer.

That responsibility does not rest on the Secretary of War; much of it rests on Congress. We ought to enact a code that would fix the boundaries of the courts, and which would define their jurisdiction and duties; but, as it is now, the inequalities of administration, it seems to me that a word from the Secretary of War to the commanding officers would bring them very quickly to a uniform administration of the law.

There is nothing in the world which will make the members of the military establishment do their duty in a proper way more surely than to discharge or reprimand an officer once in a while. There is a sort of free masonry amongst them, and whenever one of them is put on the tenterhooks for anything that he has done irregularly, every one in the Army who is of the same rank and grade has his ear to the ground and knows it, and governs himself accordingly.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Johnson of California in the chair). Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Has not the Senator from Oregon noticed the various determinations by courts of justice in the States, and noted how vastly different are the sentences which are imposed by such courts as the result of judicial proceedings?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Oh, yes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is true in like cases of like offenses which are prosecuted. I have noticed such variations to have been from 1 year to 14 years. Such sentences often depend upon the judge and upon the character of his impression as to what would be the proper sentence. Some judges believe in severe sentences; others believe in light sentences; while still others believe in almost no sentences. The severity of the sentence oftentimes results from the make-up of the individual. So I do not see how in such cases anyone can be properly charged with any neglect or any wrong in permitting these judge advocates to remain in office. People both in times of war and in civil life invariably hold different views as to crime. Some will say this man should be set up as an example: "I will show the people in this community that there has got to be respect for a certain law"; and such judges will impose severe sentences, while at the same time almost across the border in another judicial district there will be another judge who will impose a very light sentence. That is human nature; men are differently constituted; so it seems to me when these inequalities of sentences have occurred no one is to blame except the individual who imposes the sentence.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I realize the force of the Senator's suggestion. I have had some of the same experiences the Senator has had, and, besides that, I was prosecuting officer in my State in a large district for four years, and I know the difficulty of meting out exact justice. The conditions in different communities or different counties in the same State will be entirely different; but there is the great equalizing power in the Chief Executive, and ninety-nine times out of one hundred he exercises it so as to equalize inequalities by the use of the pardoning power or in some other way. But here is a great central government with a Secretary of War entirely in charge of the military branch of it, and under whose jurisdiction all of these crimes come. He can very much relieve the situation if he will only attempt by proper order to do so. When he sees that two young men in the same cantonment, as at Camp Beauregard, are sentenced, one for 15 years and one for 25 years, for exactly the same offense, a simple word from him to the President of the United States would result in equalizing the sentences, if necessary, by the use of the pardoning power.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the Senator mean the same offense or the same charge?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The same charge.

Mr. WILLIAMS. When two men are charged with the same offense and brought up for trial, the Senator must recognize, as I do, that the facts may appear entirely different in the two cases. The character of the two culprits, or the alleged culprits, may appear entirely different. There is not an inequality of punishment for an offense, but an inequality of punishment on a charge. One man is found guilty of killing another, another man is found guilty of killing still another, and a third of killing still a third; one man is hung, one man is sent to the penitentiary for life, and one man is convicted of manslaughter. All the Senator knows about these cases is that the charges were identical.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The suggestion of the Senator is more or less true. In the very great haste—

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator whether these individual cases to which he has referred have been appealed to the Judge Advocate General?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think all of them have been.

So much for that, Mr. President. Where there is a noticeable inequality on the face of the record, and there are those under the Military Establishment who know the facts, it seems to me they ought to be looked into, with the power of recommendation somewhere to relieve the situation; but the sure cure for it all is to have some sort of a tribunal, appellate or supervisory, that shall have the power to formulate rules and equalize these unjust sentences, under the direction, of course, of the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question there, if he will yield.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Taken for granted that the Senator's suggestion is perfectly apropos and perfectly right, whose fault is it that there is no such tribunal? It can not be the fault of the Secretary of War.

Now, I should like to ask the Senator another question in that connection, and let him answer them both at once. Suppose he was Secretary of War, or suppose that I was Secretary of War. Does the Senator imagine that either he or I could take personal cognizance of all the thousands of cases, examine them like a justice of the peace, and go into the testimony to see just how far each individual ought to be punished? In other words, if there is not a tribunal—and there would have to be about a thousand tribunals, by the way, for one could not attend to all the business—how do you expect a man of flesh and blood, like Baker or Chamberlain or Williams, to go into all these cases?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I realize the force of what the Senator says, and I stated before the Senator came in and did me the honor of his presence that I am delivering this one message and placing it in the Congressional Record to call the attention of the Secretary of War to conditions. I can not take up the innumerable cases that have come to me, and do not expect the Secretary of War to do so; but the secretary has never been denied anything in the way of assistance that he has asked for in this war.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, if the Senator will pardon me just once more, and then I hope to let him alone—

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I hope so, because I wish to finish.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not only the present Secretary of War, but various Secretaries of War, have communicated to us in times of peace and in times of war, during the Revolution, the Mexican War, the war between the States, the Spanish-American War, and this war, and so far the committee over which the Senator from Oregon presides—the Military Affairs Committee—has had charge of the question of courts-martial. The whole country has agreed to substitute in time of war for the ordinary courts operative in times of peace, for justices of the peace, circuit courts, appellate courts, and various courts, so-called courts-martial. They have tried to organize them so that approximate and quick justice could be dispensed in war times. It must be quick; we can not fool with it; we have got to keep up discipline in the Army; and being determined to do that we have organized the present courts-martial. The Senator will remember that while serving upon the committee of which he is chairman and of which I was once a member, I found at one time that one officer had been the accuser, the judge, and the chief witness against a man whose rank had been taken away from him. We remedied that, and why can not the committee remedy such other injustices as suggest themselves?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think the committee will attempt to do so where legislation is necessary, Mr. President, but the committee occupies this position: The committee is limited as to its clerical force. To attend to all these things is a physical impossibility for the committee with the clerical force that the committee has, while the Secretary of War is supplied not only with a great body of legal advisers, to whom he can refer any of these matters either for advice or to draft legislation, but with as much money as he needs for any legitimate military purpose. We have amended the Articles of War during this Congress two or three times at the request of the Secretary of War. He is having these difficulties pointed out to him, and I have not any doubt that if he asks for another amendment to the Articles of War we will amend them again.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to ask the Senator if, from his observation, he has not long since arrived at the conclusion that all of the punishments imposed by courts-martial, taking them as a body, are immensely more severe than punishments which would be imposed by the ordinary courts and in most cases we might say unconscionably severe?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think that is true, but I will say to the Senator that in times of war I have no objection to the severity of sentences, as a rule, because discipline is absolutely necessary to be maintained. If a soldier is guilty of an offense and is only sentenced to five days there might be 5,000 men associated with him who would commit the same offense if they knew they would only get five days' punishment.

Mr. McCUMBER. But even in times of peace I find the punishments imposed by courts-martial immensely more severe than the punishments imposed by civil courts.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the Senator would not punish the Senator from North Dakota for going to sleep at all, would he?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Not if he were in good company and with some one like the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But the Senator would punish a soldier for going to sleep when he was a sentinel, and he might have to shoot him for doing it, because it is a very serious offense.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, of course; there is no doubt about that in time of war.

Now, Mr. President, these remarks are just by way of suggestion with reference to the dispensing of military justice, and I do hope that the War Department will take some notice of them.

EXHIBIT 163.

LETTER OF GENERAL CROWDER.

FEBRUARY 13, 1919.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Upon resuming active supervision of the work of the Judge Advocate General's office early in January of this year, after a year of almost exclusive preoccupation with my duties as Provost Marshal General, I found your reference calling my attention to the remarks of Senator Chamberlain, printed in the Congressional Record of January 3, 1919, which voiced certain criticisms upon the administration of military justice during the war. I have been reflecting upon the most appropriate manner of putting you in possession of the facts on the subject dealt with in these remarks.

The subject, in general—I mean that of military justice during the war—is, of course, within my special province as Judge Advocate General of the Army; and it has been peculiarly a matter of the most conscientious solicitude on the part of myself and of the Acting Judge Advocate General, who had the direct supervision of the office during my special preoccupation with the other duties. Of the nearly 100 judge advocates attached to the office in Washington during the past year, some 50 have been assigned exclusively to the Division of Military Justice, scrutinizing the record of every one of the thousands of general court-martial cases arriving in Washington for revision. These skilled lawyers (all but two of them brought recently into the Army from civil practice, and including some eminent incumbents from the judicial bench) have been keenly alive to the demands of the situation. Months before any of these after-the-war criticisms appeared, and from the very outset of the year 1918, when the disciplinary records of the new Army were already enlarging many fold the work of this office, the Division of Military Justice had begun to apply measures adapted to safeguard the cause of justice to the individual. And, as the year went on, the progress of court-martial practice was closely and continuously followed, with a view to correcting the legal errors, equalizing the sentences in the various divisions, and exercising the appropriate clemency. How notable were the results achieved by this conscientious scrutiny before the close of the year 1918 I will later point out, noting here merely that these results were already accessible to any inquirer at this office before the close of the year 1918.

It goes without saying, therefore, that all the authentic data that would throw light on the correctness of Senator Chamberlain's complaints are to be found in the accumulated records of my office. And I could wish that he had afforded me an opportunity, however scanty, to lay before him the general tenor of these records, or any part of them, before advancing publicly the assertions contained in his remarks on military justice.

However, since receiving your reference, my own question has been whether to wait until a full and exhaustive account could be prepared for you, showing the whole range of facts in that field during the war period, or whether, with-for that, it would be worth while to offer you, as a provisional basis upon the topics concretely touched on in the Senator's remarks. I intend to take the latter course, reserving for a later and formal report a body of facts concerning military justice during the war period. The Senator's remarks run along two lines. In the first place, he cites certain cases having special features open to criticism. In the second place, he makes certain generalizations involving general conditions and practices. It is necessary to deal with his remarks under two separate heads, and, with your permission, I will do so. Whether or not these individual cases justify the criticism as made is simply a question of the facts in each of them. They differ widely in their nature, and each must receive its own explanation, based solely on its own facts and no other. But whether the Senator's assertions as to general conditions and practices are correct is a distinct question, ranging over the entire field of military justice, and these assertions must therefore be examined in the light of the entire mass of cases.

Therefore, by taking up the individual cases cited by the Senator for criticism; and at the same time it will be convenient to include a few other individual cases cited on the floor of Congress by Mr. Chamberlain in a newspaper article. (Congressional Record, Jan. 23, 1919, p. 1988).

1. INDIVIDUAL CASES CITED FOR CRITICISM.

The first case cited by Senator Chamberlain is that of a soldier at Camp Ford No. 110595, tried January 24, 1918), who, while patrolling the military police was found at midnight in a shop just after a burglary. Charged with burglary, he asserted that he had entered the shop in the disguise of a burglar. His story was disbelieved, and he was found guilty; the first finding was not guilty, but at the commanding officer's request, there was a reconsideration, and the second finding was guilty. On revision of the case, no legal error could be found; but this office reached the opinion that there was sufficient evidence to sustain the finding the evidence did not show to show his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. In such a situation the Court in the United States (with three, or four exceptions only) cannot set aside a jury's verdict. Nevertheless, this office recommended reconsideration of the verdict by the reviewing authority. It was considered; but the court adhered to its finding. But the feature for criticism is that reconsideration was given not by exercising the "arbitration of a military commander," but by referring the case to the Judge Advocate of the command, as legal adviser. The Judge Advocate wrote an opinion in view of the evidence, disagreeing with the view of this office, and recommending confirmation; and the commanding general followed this opinion of the Judge Advocate.

Therefore, instead of being, as Senator Chamberlain has been led to believe, an illustration of "the control which the military commander exercises over the administration of civil justice," it illustrates exactly the opposite. In the first place, the confirmation of the sentence was made, not by the military discretion of the commanding officer, but upon the legal advice of the Judge Advocate, an ex-civilian lawyer. And, in the second place, the reconsideration which was actually given by the Judge Advocate on the ground that the evidence was beyond a reasonable doubt, was a measure of protection which is not provided in any civil court in the United States for the control of a jury's verdict. The case is a good illustration of a feature in which the military justice sometimes does even more for the accused than the civil justice.

The second case cited by Senator Chamberlain is that of an absence without leave at Camp Beauregard (record No. 116490, tried June 6, 1918), in which a 25 years was imposed on a soldier who had gone home (as he was permitted to see a sick mother after the company had been notified of their departure for the battlefield in France; he returned to camp just after it had left. This offense of leaving for home when the regiment is at the point of departure overseas is obviously one of the most disorganizing plans. In this case it was committed at a time when the allied forces were in daily need of American help, and our units were being rushed to the ports of embarkation. By leaving camp in this particular case the soldier successfully evaded going into the fight with his comrades. The seriousness of the offense must be emphasized in the sight of the Army discipline imposed, needs no argument.

But the Senator errs in implying that the man was dishonorably discharged, for he was not. The sentence of dishonorable discharge was suspended, which means, under the law, that his confinement has practically no minimum, and that if his conduct is good he may be released from confinement and restored to duty at any time.

3. The third case cited by Senator Chamberlain is a similar case of absence without leave at the same camp (record No. 116800) under almost identical circumstances; but in this case a sentence of 15 years, instead of 25 years, was imposed. This matter of the variability of sentence is later explained by me, in its general aspects. But the difference of periods, however, has in this case not the significance which it appears to have, because the sentence of dishonorable discharge was in this case also suspended, and the offender went to the disciplinary barracks for a period of confinement having no minimum, and upon a record of good conduct he may be restored to duty at any time, and his confinement be terminated.

4. The next case cited by Senator Chamberlain is a case of sleeping on post at Camp Merritt, the sentence being for 10 years. The Senator's brief description of the case applies to two offenders, tried nearly at the same time. (Record No. 114717, tried Apr. 25, 1918, and record No. 115506, tried May 17, 1918).

In the one case the sentence was reduced by the commanding officer to six months, probably because the soldier was a youth of 17. This reduction was apparently not known to Senator Chamberlain, for he does not mention it. There is certainly nothing harsh in military justice in this case.

In the other case the sentence was approved by the commanding general; and on November 22, 1918, the Judge Advocate General's office, on application, after a careful scrutiny of the record, declined to recommend clemency; so that it may be assumed that the circumstances of the case did not merit it. But here, too, the sentence of dishonorable discharge was suspended by the commanding general; the period of confinement has no minimum; and the offender may be restored at any time, after a record of good conduct.

5. The next case cited by Senator Chamberlain is another instance of sleeping on post, the sentence being for 10 years. (Record No. 113076, tried on Mar. 21, 1918, at Camp Merritt.) As the sentinel had been drinking whisky shortly before going on guard, had actually left his post, and was found asleep in a toilet, the case was plainly one for making an example, and the sentence is therefore hardly to be termed severe. The Judge Advocate General's office, however, after at first declining, on application, to recommend clemency, later considered the case a second time, on December 12, 1918, and notified The Adjutant General that there was no objection to his restoration to duty.

But at this point I must take notice of Senator Chamberlain's expression, applied in his remarks to the duty assigned to this soldier, of guarding a sentinel's post, as "virtually a watchman's job." I feel sure that even the civilian mind will readily appreciate the high responsibility of a sentinel's post in time of war, and that this expression will be recognized as inappropriate. The war was not only in France; it was in our own country also; and at the post where this sentinel was on guard there were millions of dollars worth of supplies, waiting for early shipment to equip the forces on the battle front, and lying open to destruction by the incendiary agents of the enemy, who lurked at every such spot in our own country. That under such circumstances the offense of sleeping on post belongs among the most serious and dangerous misdeeds of a soldier needs no further argument.

6. The next case cited by Senator Chamberlain is one of disobedience to orders to drill, and of having seditious literature in possession for distribution. The offender was a conscientious objector who had not been given an opportunity for noncombatant service, and who was not attempting nor intending to distribute literature. The sentence was death; but the Senator adds that it was "disapproved by the President and the prisoner discharged," and he expresses the hope that "the President will exercise the same clemency and show the same mercy in many other cases." Now, the facts of the record demonstrate the precise opposite of what the Senator was led to believe, because in this case (record No. 116790), tried June 17, 1918, it was not the President's clemency that discharged the prisoner; it was the effective operation of that very system of military law which the Senator supposes not to exist. What happened was that the Judge Advocate General's office recommended disapproval of the sentence on the strictly legal grounds that the order to drill was (under G. O. No. 28, 1918) not a lawful command, and his disobedience was therefore not an offense; and that there was no evidence of the accused's intention to distribute the literature. The sentence was therefore disapproved, and the prisoner discharged on the legal grounds stated by my office. This case, therefore, far from illustrating the Senator's thesis, rather affords an illustration of the operation of military law and justice in entire analogy to that of civil law and justice.

This completes the list of particular cases cited by Senator Chamberlain. I turn now to the particular cases cited in the newspaper article read into the Congressional Record by Mr. Siegel. (Congressional Record, vol. 57, No. 44, Jan. 23, 1918, p. 1888.)

7. Taking these cases, for convenience sake, in the reverse order of their mention in the article, we are told of three cases of supposedly excessive sentences for the offense of desertion or absence without leave; all three of them being of the type of a return to visit the home family in distress. I should be glad to make any explanations or admissions which these cases might merit, but they are so indefinitely described in their citation that it has been impossible to identify them even after a careful search of many records.

As they are criticized, however, on no other ground than that of the severity of the sentences, I think that what has been already here said on the other cases of that sort will serve as a sufficient comment.

8. The next instance cited by the writer in question concerns two death sentences imposed in France for sleeping on post in a front-line trench. There are really three distinct questions involved in these cases; first, whether a sentence of death in all cases of this offense should be the inexorable policy; secondly, whether, if not, these particular cases showed sufficient extenuating circumstances; and, thirdly, whether the cases were fairly and fully tried to get at the facts.

Upon the first question, it is enough here to say that Gen. Pershing especially urged the importance of adopting this policy for the protection of his Army's welfare; and his chief law officer concurred in this message; and that under such circumstances no one could have been criticized for acceding to this urgent request and adhering to the principle handed down by all the fixed traditions of military law. I myself, as you know, was at first disposed to defer to the urgent recommendations of Gen. Pershing; but continued reflection caused me to withdraw from that extreme view; and some days before the case was presented for your final action the record contained a recommendation from me pointing in the direction of clemency.

Upon the second question it can be stated that, except for the youth of the offenders (they were about 20 years of age), there were no special extenuating circumstances. The task laid upon these soldiers was no greater in its exactions than was laid upon hundreds of others, at the very same moment in the allied forces doing duty in the trenches. The chief of staff's memorandum states the situation with great force:

"The American Expeditionary Force is confronted by the most alert and dangerous foe known in the history of the world. The safety not only of the sentinel's company, but of the entire command, is absolutely dependent on the vigilant performance of his duties as a sentinel. The safety of that command depends in an equal measure upon the prompt and complete obedience of the different men to the lawful commands of their superior officers. There is no doubt but that the members of this court had had the necessity for the alert performance of the duties of a sentinel strongly impressed upon them at the immediate time of the commission of those offenses. Before daylight on the morning of November 3, 1917, the first attack by the Germans upon the American lines took place. A salient near Artois, which was occupied by Company F of the Sixteenth Infantry, was raided by the Germans, who killed 3 of our men, wounded 11, and captured and carried off 11 more. The very next night—that is, the night of November 3–4, 1917, Pvt. Sebastian was found sleeping on his post, and on the night of the 5th, Pvt. Cook was found sleeping on his post. Both of these men belonged to the regiment which had suffered in the German raid of 2d–3d. This condition of affairs presented an absolute menace not only to that portion of the line held by the American troops, but to the French troops in the adjacent sectors."

That the decision to exercise clemency was a sound one, I do not doubt. But no candid reader of the record could look upon these cases as anything but a distressing instance of the inevitable mental conflict that arises between the stern necessities of war discipline and the natural human sympathy for men who have incurred the death penalty, a conflict which equally agitates every civil judge and every civil executive when such a case is presented for his action. It is unconscionable that this situation should be cited as a peculiarity of the military system.

The third question—whether the case was fairly and fully tried so as to present all the facts—would require too extended a survey for giving all the details here. I content myself with assuring you (what you, indeed, know already) that the record was scrutinized by several of the most experienced judge advocates of my staff as well as by myself personally, and that, although the cases were not tried as thoroughly as they could and should have been tried, where the death penalty was involved, nevertheless no reversible error was found and there was no doubt of the facts in either case. The only issue in this case was the severity of the sentence, as above mentioned.

9. The writer also cites, in the same connection, two other cases coming at the same time from France; in these the death sentence was imposed for refusal to drill. The circumstance indicated an obstinacy amounting to aggravation. But it was decided by you that clemency should be exercised to the extent of commuting the sentences to three years' penal servitude. And as the writer of the article in question makes no tangible criticisms, but merely couples these cases with the foregoing two, I pass them over.

It should be noted, however, as a sample of the writer's unfair presentation, that he is incorrect, in point of fact, in asserting that "upon their plea (of guilty) alone these two men were sentenced to death." Both men were tried upon testimony adduced by the prosecution after their plea of guilty was entered; both men declined to call any witnesses in denial or in extenuation. The scantiness of the record, however, was of itself sufficient ground for exercising clemency.

10. The remaining case cited in the newspaper article read into the record by Mr. Siegel is that known as the "Texas mutineers" case (Record No. 106663, tried at Fort Bliss, Tex., Sept., 1917). The criticism made upon this case is that certain sergeants, having been ordered under arrest by a young officer for a very minor offense, were afterwards, while still under arrest, directed to drill; but as the Army Regulations, properly construed, do not authorize noncommissioned officers to be required to attend drill formations while under arrest, the sergeants declined to drill as ordered. For this disobedience they were found guilty of mutiny and sentenced to dishonorable discharge and imprisonment for terms of between 10 and 25 years.

Now, it may be at once and unreservedly admitted that this was a genuine case of injustice, and that the injustice was due to an overstrict attitude of military officers toward discipline, for it is conceded by all that the young officer who gave the order to drill was both tactless and unjustified in his conduct, and it is conceded that the commanding officer who reviewed and approved the sentence was a Regular Army officer of long experience who failed to appreciate the justice of the situation. That this case illustrates the occasional possibility of the military spirit of discipline overshadowing the sense of law and justice is plain enough. But that it indicates any general condition can not for a moment be asserted.

Moreover, this very case serves also to illustrate the essentially law-enforcing spirit which dominates in the office of the Judge Advocate General. The impropriety and illegality of the sentence in this case was immediately recognized when the record arrived in the office for review. One opinion was prepared pointing out the irregularity and injustice, and directing that the findings be set aside. But the legality of such a direction was questioned, in the face of a ruling by the Attorney General of the United States many years ago that a sentence of court-martial, once executed, can not be set aside even by the President himself. This raised the general question of the authority of the Judge Advocate General not merely to recommend for clemency (which would not have been an adequate redress for the convicted men in this case), but to direct the setting aside of the findings in a judgment of a court-martial for legal error where the sentence had been already executed (namely, in this case, the sentence of dishonorable discharge). The Secretary of War having sustained the doubt as to the authority of the Judge Advocate General to take such radical action, clemency was extended by the President releasing the men from confinement and restoring them to duty within about two months from the date of their conviction. At the same time a new measure was adopted by the Secretary of War in the shape of General Order No. 7, War Department, 1918, taking effect February 1, 1918, which prevented the recurrence of such instances by directing that the commanding general, upon confirming a sentence of death or officer's • dishonorable discharge should suspend the execution of the sentence, and a review of the case in the office of the Judge Advocate General. Immediate measures were taken to go as far as could be gone under the existing law, to prevent the recurrence of the situation presented by the Texas mutiny case.

• In order to make more ample and unquestionable the authority of the Judge Advocate General over court-martial trials in matters of legal error, a bill amending the Federal statutes was drafted and was sent on January 19, 1917, to the Secretary of War, to the chairmen of the Senate and House Military Committees. Subsequently the Judge Advocate General testified before the House Military Committee in support of this bill. A year that has elapsed since the dispatch of that proposed amendment to the Senate nor the House committee has seen fit to take action on the proposed legislation. It is therefore apparent that, to the extent that it exists to-day any doubt as to the amplitude of the authority to reach and control these legal errors occurring in court-martial proceedings and that it may be desirable to amplify that authority beyond present law, the responsibility for failure to take such action is to be laid at the door of the Judge Advocate General's Office, but at the door of the legislative committees of Congress.

GENERAL PRINCIPLES AND METHODS IN MILITARY JUSTICE.

• In the various criticisms of a general nature contained in Senator Dyer's remarks, they seem to be reducible to the following six heads:

1. A soldier may be put on trial by a commanding officer's arbitrary action without any preliminary inquiry into the probability of the charge. 2. Commanding officers do thus put on trial a needlessly large number of soldiers.

3. The courts-martial themselves, as a rule, impose sentences which are severe and inequitably variant.

4. The Judge Advocate General's Office either partakes in the same mistakes or makes no attempt to check it by revisory action.

5. Such attempts as the Judge Advocate General's Office does make are ineffectual, because its rulings are recommendatory only and are either ignored by division commanders or vetoed by the Chief of Staff.

6. The general treatment of accused soldiers is not according to the principles of law as embodied in the criminal code, but is according to the arbitrary discretion of the commanding officer in each case.

• In belief that the candid study of the facts will show that all six of these assertions are incorrect as representing the general conditions and apart from individual cases. But before setting forth the recorded facts on the correctness of the above six assertions, some general features must be kept in mind as positive features of protection for the accused, possible in military justice, and wholly or substantially lacking in civil justice. In military justice there is automatically a double examination of every case in the nature of appellate or revisory action by superior and reviewing authority. This is in sharp contrast to civil justice where there is no such revisory action unless the accused insists on it. Every soldier is afforded this double safeguard against illegal or unfair condemnation. The records, except in cases of inferior courts, are taken down verbatim, and the transcript of the testimony, every ruling of the court, and every claim of the accused are submitted first to the reviewing authority in the field and next to the reviewing authority at Washington. The reviewing authority has for his legal adviser a commissioned judge advocate of the rank of major or lieutenant colonel. Since September, 1917, almost all of these have been lawyers of the Regular Army, fresh from civil life, and imbued with the standards and traditions of civil practice rather than those of the Regular Army; hence likely to give as careful scrutiny as any civilian judge would give. On arrival at Washington for the second scrutiny, the records go to a staff composed of officers fresh from civilian life, ranking from major to colonel. The case goes first for scrutiny to a single officer of the military justice staff who prepares a full summary and recommendation; then to a board of three officers, who approve or modify the recommendation; then to the division commander, who again scrutinizes and approves or modifies; and finally to the Judge Advocate General or Acting Judge Advocate General, who gives his signature if satisfied. Every general court-martial case thus obtains this thorough scrutiny in two separate stages, or virtually four distinct stages. No such guaranties exist in any civilian court of the United States or probably of the world.

(b) Every military sentence as to period of confinement is virtually indeterminate, i. e., it has no minimum, and it can later be reduced to a few months or nothing. After a prisoner's sentence is affirmed, he is entitled to ask for clemency every six months. Such application is forwarded automatically by the prison superintendent to Washington. The whole record is then again reviewed. How extensively this method resulted in commuting sentences will be shown later. The clemency section of the Judge Advocate General's Office automatically acts on all such applications. Thus there is a further opportunity for correcting possible errors.

(c) The foregoing safeguards are applied without any expense to the accused. Here again is a feature wholly unknown to civilian justice. Reformers have for generations urged that civilian justice give to accused persons the fullest benefit of appellate revision without cost. They have never succeeded. But military justice already possesses this beneficent feature.

In examining the system of military justice, therefore, to see whether it permits results and methods contrasting unfavorably with our notions of civilian justice, let it be kept in mind from the outset that the American system of military justice starts with three great safeguards which are lacking in civilian justice, viz, an automatic double appellate review of every case before sentence is executed, a virtually automatic third review after sentence, and the application of these safeguards without reference to the accused's ability to raise money to pay for them.

I now take up the supposed general shortcomings alleged in Senator Chamberlain's remarks:

1. PUTTING ON TRIAL WITHOUT PRELIMINARY INQUIRY.

Every system of penal justice has some method of insuring the exercise of caution by a responsible officer in scrutinizing an accusation before an accused is put to the necessity of defending himself by a formal trial. The traditional method inherited by us in civilian justice, for serious offenses, is the presentment of a grand jury. This method has now proved cumbrous and ineffective; it has been abandoned in a majority of our States. The modern method of those States is a so-called information by the official State prosecutor, filed after such inquiry as he sees fit to make. This modern method is the one to which France and other continental nations arrived some centuries ago, about the time when England developed the grand jury instead. This modern American method is also the one used in our courts-martial; it arrived in the Anglo-American military system some centuries ago by adoption in Scotland, which itself had adopted the French system; for the French were the great military nation of three centuries ago.

By this Anglo-American military system some officer must file charges before any soldier can be tried. This protection is invariable. Often the judge advocate, as legal adviser, additionally scrutinizes a serious charge before it is filed. This is exactly the protection given by the State official prosecutor in the modern American method. How essential and thorough is this protection can only be appreciated by perusing the strict terms of the law and regulations. Paragraph 62 of the Manual for Courts-Martial reads:

"By the usage of the service all military charges should be formally preferred by—that is, authenticated by the signature of—a commissioned officer."

Paragraph 75 reads:

"Submission of charges: All charges for trial by court-martial will be prepared in triplicate, using the prescribed charge sheet as a first sheet and using such additional sheets or ordinary paper as are required. They will be accompanied—

"(a) Except when trial is to be had by summary court, by a brief statement of the substance of all material testimony expected from each material witness, both those for the prosecution and those for the defense, together with all available and necessary information as to any other actual or probable testimony or evidence in the case; and

"(b) In the case of a soldier, by properly authenticated evidence of convictions, if any, of an offense or offenses committed by him during his current enlistment and within one year next preceding the date of the alleged commission by him of any offenses set forth in the charges.

"They will be forwarded by the officer preferring them to the officer immediately exercising summary court-martial jurisdiction over the command to which the accused belongs, and will by him and by each superior commander, into whose hands they may come, either be referred to a court-martial within his jurisdiction for trial, forwarded to the next superior authority exercising court-martial jurisdiction over the command to which the accused belongs or pertains, or otherwise disposed of as circumstances may appear to require."

Paragraph 76 proceeds:

"Investigation of charges. If the officer immediately exercising summary court-martial jurisdiction over the command to which the accused belongs or pertains decides to forward the charges to superior authority, he will, before so doing, either carefully investigate them himself or will cause an officer other than the officer preferring the charges to investigate them carefully and to report to him, orally or otherwise, the result of such investigation. The officer investigating the charges will afford to the accused an opportunity to make any statement, offer any evidence, or present any matter in extenuation that he may desire to have considered in connection with the accusation against him. (See par. 225 (b), p. 112.) If the accused desires to submit nothing, the indorsement will so state. In his indorsement forwarding the charges to superior authority, the commanding officer will include: (a) The name of the officer who investigated the charges; (b) the opinion of both such officer and himself as to whether the several charges can be sustained; (c) the substance of such material statement, if any, as the accused may have voluntarily made in connection with the case during the investigation thereof; (d) a summary of the extenuating circumstances, if any, connected with the case; (e) his recommendation of action to be taken."

It will therefore be seen that the regulations required the strictest scrutiny by a responsible officer before any accused can be put on trial by a court-martial.

In Senator Chamberlain's remarks occurs the following sentence: "The commanding office may, without any investigation of the circumstances, order a man tried by court-martial; in the French Army such cases are not sent to trial until investigation can determine whether the man ought to be tried." How is it possible for such an assertion to be made in the face of the law and regulations represented in the quotation above from paragraph 76 of the manual? The safeguard contained in our manual of military justice stands on exactly the same footing with the safeguard contained in the modern method of the State prosecutor and of the French system as cited by Senator Chamberlain.

But whatever may be the law and the regulations, doubtless it may be asserted that the regulation is not obeyed in spirit. This is, in fact, the precise assertion of Senator Chamberlain in a further paragraph of his remarks; and to that assertion I now come.

2. EXCESSIVELY LARGE NUMBER OF TRIVIAL CHARGES.

It is asserted by Senator Chamberlain that commanding officers direct the filing of trivial charges in excessively large numbers. His precise language is: "It is not surprising, under the circumstances, that there are too many trivial cases sent to trial by court-martial."

Let us examine this assertion in the light of the facts of military justice during the past year, as shown by the records.

The United States military forces raised up to November 11, 1918, numbered some 4,185,000; of these about 290,000 were already in service at the opening of the war, of whom 127,000 were in the Regular Army. Thus over 90 per cent were new men, fresh from civilian life. It must be taken for certain that their unfamiliarity with military discipline and the novelty of its rigid restraints would produce an unusual proportion of minor breaches of discipline. In other words, if commanding officers had been merely as strict and rigorous as with the Regular Army before the war in pursuing minor breaches of discipline with court-martial charges, the ratio of trials would be at least as great and presumably far greater than before the war and the accession of the new army.

But the facts show, on the contrary, that commanding officers must have been far less strict and rigorous than before.

Let us take first the serious charges brought before general courts-martial. The printed report of the judge advocate general for the fiscal year, 1918, shows that the total number of general court-martial trials in the Regular Army of 127,000 in the year ending June, 1917, was 6,200, or about 1 for every 20 men; while the total in the entire army for the year ending June, 1918, was less than 12,000, or only 1 for every 200 men (the military forces on May 31, numbering 2,415,000); and during the last six months of 1918 the total was 7,624, or at the rate per annum of only 1 for every 275 men (the military forces on Nov. 11, 1918, numbering 4,185,000). As to special courts-martial for the lesser offenses the number in the Regular Army for the year ending June, 1917, was 2,970, or 1 for every 42 men, while for the year ending June, 1918, it was 14,700, or only 1 for every 165 men. Moreover, as between the Regular Army and National Guard and the National Army or new drafted men, the number of general courts-martial for the year ending June, 1918, was 10,363 for the former and only 1,660 for the latter, or 1 for every 107 men in the Regular Army and National Guard (numbering on May 31, 1918, some 1,112,000, and composed in part of seasoned men, but only 1 in every 800 men for the National Army (numbering on May 31, 1918, some 1,333,000, and composed entirely of new drafted men); showing conclusively that commanding officers were more lenient and liberal with the men fresh from civilian life.

Turning now to the "trivial offenses" referred to by Senator Chamberlain, they are covered by the summary courts-martial, representing the extremely petty disciplinary penalties not requiring a review by the division commander. The number of trials for the Regular Army, viz, 48,000 in 1917 (rising from an average of 38,000 for 10 years past, due to a proportionate increase in the size of the Regular Army), rose in the year ending June, 1918, to only 212,000, or slightly more than four times the number, although the entire military forces in the year ending June, 1918, rose to 2,415,000, or nineteen times the former size. In short, the petty disciplinary penalties dropped from a ratio of 1 to each 2.7 men to a ratio of 1 to each 11.4 men, or a decrease for 1918 to less than one-quarter of that of 1917.

There could be no more conclusive demonstration that commanding officers, though faced with a situation full of inducement to rigor in enforcing discipline among raw and untrained men, did, in fact, use remarkable consideration and self-restraint in not resorting to the instrumentalities of courts-martial. The facts show therefore precisely the opposite of the condition asserted by Senator Chamberlain.

3. SEVERITY AND VARIABILITY OF SENTENCES BY COURTS-MARTIAL.

The severity and variability of the sentences are two distinct features, and I shall therefore take them up separately, and under each of the two heads I shall further set forth the facts according to the respective offenses, because there can hardly be a common standard of either severity or variability for all offenses. In order to abridge my presentation I have taken the nine most common military offenses. In the tables of figures appended to this letter will be found the detailed data, to which I shall refer in the text of my letter.

(1) Severity of sentences.—In considering the severity of sentences it is, of course, necessary to examine separately the different offenses, since obviously the appropriate punishment varies widely for offenses of different moral culpability and different danger to military discipline.

(a) Desertion.—No one can approach the subject of sentences for desertion in time of war without keeping in mind the solemn and terrible warning recorded expressly for our benefit by Brig. Gen. Oakes, acting assistant provost marshal general for Illinois, as set forth in his report printed in the Report of the Provost Marshal General for the Civil War (pt. 2, p. 29). In impressive language he lays the following injunction upon us:

"Incalculable evil has resulted from the clemency of the Government toward deserters. By a merciful severity at the commencement of the war the mischief might have been nipped in the bud, and the crime of desertion could never have reached the gigantic proportions which it attained before the close of the conflict. The people were then ardent and enthusiastic in their loyalty and would have cheerfully and cordially assented to any measures deemed necessary to the strength and integrity of the Army. They had heard of the 'rules and articles of war,' and were fully prepared to see * * * that the deserters from the Army would be remorselessly arrested, tried by courts-martial, and, if guilty, be forthwith shot to death with musketry.

"This was unquestionably the almost universal attitude of the public mind when hostilities began, and the just expectations of the people should not have been disappointed. Arrest, trial, and execution should have been the short, sharp, and decisive fate of the first deserters. * * * The Government was far behind the people in this matter, and so continued until long and certain immunity had thrown such swarms of deserters and desperadoes into every State that it was then too late to avert the calamity. * * * I state these things so that if we have another war the Government may start right—put deserters to death, enforce military law, strike hard blows at the outset, tone up the national mind at once to a realization that war is war, and be sure that such a policy will be indorsed and sustained by the people.

“There are other suggestions to be made in respect to deserters, but the one I have already advanced—the nonenforcement of the penalties provided by the military code for the crime of desertion, especially at the beginning—is, beyond all question, the grand fundamental cause of the unparalleled increase of that crime and of the inability of district provost marshals, with their whole force of special agents and detectives to rid the country of deserters.”

This solemn warning was naturally in our minds at the opening of the present war. But, in spite of its urgency, it was decided to exhibit our faith in the American people and to place our trust in that loyalty and devotion to duty which we felt sure would characterize the vast majority of to-day's young American manhood. We believed that the “short, sharp, and decisive fate of the first deserters” should not be the extreme penalty as urged by Gen. Oakes. And the view was generally accepted in the Army that terms of imprisonment should be ordinarily deemed the adequate repressive measure for the few who might need it. And it is a fact that of the 2,025 convictions covered by the figures shown in Table C there is not a single sentence of death for desertion.

It must, therefore, be kept in mind at the outset that the refusal to adopt the policy of death sentences for desertion was in itself a repudiation of the policy of extreme severity, and that the practice of limiting desertion sentences to terms of imprisonment is in itself the adoption of a policy of leniency. There may be a reproach for variability; but reproach for severity must deal with the fact that the policy adopted disregarded the extreme penalty authorized by Congress.

Turning, then, to the recorded facts, we find (Table A) that the total number of convictions for desertions for the year October, 1917—September, 1918, was 2,025; that the average sentence was 7.58 years; that nearly 24 per cent of these sentences were for less than 2 years; that 64 per cent were for less than 10 years; and that only 35.90 per cent were for a greater period than 10 years. The article of war reads: “Any person who deserts shall, if the offense be committed in time of war, suffer death, or such other punishment as the court-martial may direct.” It would seem, therefore, that in point of severity the result of court-martial sentences for desertion can not be charged with erring on the side of severity.

You will notice that I do not here attempt to account for the justice of individual cases. Certain of the sentences for 25 years or even for lesser periods are open to criticism as excessively severe under the circumstances of the individual case. But it must be kept in mind that these trials and sentences were found legally valid by the Judge Advocate General's Office; that the only issue of doubt that could arise concerns the quantum of the sentence; and that the scrutiny of the clemency section in the Military Justice Division of the office may be relied upon to detect cases of excessive severity before any substantial portion of such a sentence has been served. Indeed, by the plan already this month sanctioned by yourself and announced to the public, there is now proceeding a general revision of sentences which will include in its scope the majority of all sentences, and not merely the excessively severe ones. But the excessive severity of an individual sentence is not the question here; that question would call for the scrutiny of the particular case. The question here is of general conditions. What the above figures show in respect to general conditions, or the trend of conditions, is that the practice has been one of relatively moderate penalties instead of the severest one permissible under the law.

(b) Absence without leave (Table A. No. 2).—Absence without leave is an offense which represents, in many instances, cases of actual desertion; but, owing to the movements of the military unit and thus the difficulty of obtaining the necessary technical proof, the actual deserter is frequently convicted of no more than an absence without leave. It is, therefore, plain that the offense of absence without leave may, upon its circumstances, merit an extremely severe penalty, equal to that of desertion. In time of war, this offense may lawfully be punished by any penalty short of death; in time of peace a presidential order limits the maximum penalty to six months' confinement.

For the year ending September, 1918, the total convictions for this offense numbered 3,362; the average sentence was 1.59 years (or only three times the small maximum allowed in peace times); 11 per cent of the offenses received no penalty or imprisonment; 67 per cent received a sentence of less than 2 years imprisonment; and only 22 per cent received a penalty of more than 2 years in prison. When it is remembered, as above pointed out, that this offense is in many cases virtually the offense of an actual deserter, it will be seen that the number of the sentences over two years may not be disproportionate to the probable ratio of cases individually calling for the higher penalties. An average of 1.58 years for this offense, committed in time of war, can not be deemed an exhibition of severity, where, in fact, the act of Congress establishing the Articles of War leaves the court-martial absolutely untrammelled (short of the death sentence) in the penalty to be fixed to this offense.

(c) Sleeping on post (Table A, No. 3).—The offense of sleeping on post is punishable by death in time of war, and in time of peace "any punishment except death that a court-martial may direct." There were two sentences of death imposed by courts-martial in France for sleeping on post in the zone of operations and in the front-line trenches; those two individual cases I have already commented on in the first part of this letter. Of the whole 609 convictions, some 575 of the offenses took place in the United States, where it may be supposed that the highest penalty suitable for forces engaged with the enemy would hardly be applicable. And it is a fact that of the entire 575 there was only one sentence over 15 years, and only four sentences over 10 years. For 10 per cent of the sentences no imprisonment at all was prescribed; for 62.40 per cent of the sentences, the period imposed was less than 2 years; and all told, only 27.42 per cent of the sentences were for more than 2 years. Having in view the maximum provisions of the Articles of War, it seems plain that the treatment of this offense by courts-martial can scarcely be called a harsh one.

(d) Assaulting a superior officer (Table A, No. 4).—The offense of assaulting an officer is punishable, under the Articles of War, by "Death or such other punishment as the court-martial might direct"; and this irrespective of a state of war or of peace. The total convictions for this offense were only 31, giving an average sentence of 4.10 years; nearly 50 per cent of them being for a period of less than 2 years. Again, one may say that in the face of the capital punishment expressly authorized as a maximum by the Articles of War, courts-martial have not followed a practice which may be characterized as harsh or severe.

(e) Assaulting a noncommissioned officer (Table A, No. 5).—The offense of assaulting a noncommissioned officer is liable to "any punishment that the court-martial may direct"; and this irrespective of a state of peace or war. The total number of such convictions was 132; the average sentence was 2.36 years; more than 6 per cent were punished without imprisonment, and more than 57 per cent were punished by imprisonment of less than 2 years. There are half a dozen sentences for upwards of 10 years; the justification for these must rest upon their individual circumstances. But the average sentence of 2.36 years, compared with the maximum allowable under the Articles of War, can not be admitted to exhibit a general disposition to severity, but quite the contrary.

(f) Disobeying a noncommissioned officer (Table A, No. 6).—The disobedience of the lawful order of a noncommissioned officer by the Articles of War placed under the same penalty as the assaulting of a noncommissioned officer; that is, the court-martial has complete discretion in choosing the penalties, except that of death. The total number of convictions was 411, and the average sentence was 3.04 years; 8.27 per cent of sentences gave no period of imprisonment; 50 per cent gave a period of less than 2 years.

In itself, this average sentence, comparing it with the maximum allowed by the Articles of War, can not be referred to as a severe one. It is notable, however, that this offense of disobeying a noncommissioned officer, received a higher average of sentence, viz. 3.04 years, than the apparently more heinous one of assaulting a noncommissioned officer, viz. 2.36 years. It may be admitted that some explanation remains to be sought for this apparently anomalous result, but it can be pointed out here that the disobedience of a noncommissioned officer is often of a deliberate character making the offense a highly serious one, whereas the offense of assaulting an officer is often the result merely of a quick temper without any deliberate intention of resistance to authority, and that it thus deserves considerate attention by the tribunal.

(g) Mutiny (Table A, No. 7).—There were 51 convictions for mutiny; the average sentence was 7.93 years; 27 per cent fell between 2 and 3 years, and 43 per cent fell between 10 to 15 years; the other sentences scattering over the various percentages. The Articles of War provide that a person guilty of mutiny "shall suffer death or such other punishment as the court-martial may direct," irrespective of a state of peace or war. When committed in its most significant form, it is, of course, the most heinous offense of a soldier. But it may also be committed under much less culpable circumstances. In short, it gives an opportunity for the widest range of discretion in the imposition of sentences. This inherent quality is reflected in the wide range of sentences actually imposed. In view of the fact that, in any army numbering more than 3,000,000 men at the time covered by these records, there were only 51 offenses in the nature of mutiny or related thereto, out of a total number of offenses of 12,472, it is plain that the number of such convictions is extremely small; and it must be inferred that the commanding officers were not seeking relentlessly for offenses that could be characterized as mutiny, and that the offenses actually characterized as such were offenses which well deserved the name. From June, 1917, to June, 1918, when the Regular Army and National Guard together consisted of less than 300,000 men, the total number of convictions for mutiny was 43; and yet with an army of ten times the size, the number of convictions for mutiny increased only one-fifth. It seems obvious that the practice of courts-martial during the year of the war could hardly justify a reproach of severity for the offense of mutiny.

(h) Disobeying standing orders (Table A, No. 8).—This offense is punishable under the Articles of War by such sentence of imprisonment as the court-martial may direct. The total number of convictions for this offense was 208; the average sentence is 1.96 years; for 12 per cent of the sentences no period of confinement was imposed; for 60.58 per cent a confinement of less than 2 years was imposed; 10.58 per cent of sentences were between 5 and 10 years; the rest scattering in other periods. In view of the maximum limit permitted to the discretion of the court under the Articles of War, and in view of the variety of circumstances affecting the nature of this offense, it can not be said that the tendency of the courts has been to severity.

(i) Disobeying an officer (Table A, No. 9).—The offense of disobeying a superior officer is punishable, under the Articles of War, by "death or such other punishment as the court-martial may direct"; It is covered by the same article of war that deals with assault on a superior officer, but obviously it should usually rank as an offense of lower grade. The total number of convictions for this offense was 785; the average sentence was for 4.34 years; 6 per cent of sentences were punished by imprisonment; 43.69 were punished by confinement of less than 2 years; and a trifle over 50 per cent were punished by some period greater than 2 years, there being 1 death sentence and 18 sentences for 25 years or more. It will be noticed that the average sentence for this offense was almost identical with the average sentence for the offense (No. 4 above) of assaulting a superior officer, and that in both cases a little less than 50 per cent of sentences were for periods of confinement less than 2 years. But these two offenses were treated differently with respect to the sentences for higher periods; the bulk of the long-termed sentences for assaulting an officer lying between 5 and 10 years, while for the offense of disobeying an officer, they were spread out over the periods between 3 years and 25 years or more. Comparing the absolutely unlimited nature of the punishment permitted by the Articles of War to be imposed by the court-martial, and observing that 50 per cent of these sentences were for periods of under 2 years, it can not be that the tribunals appear to be seeking to exercise the maximum of severity allowable, but rather the contrary.

This completes my survey of the sentences for the nine principal military offenses.

In the foregoing comments it will be noticed that, since a charge of excessive severity implies the habitual resort to a maximum standard allowable under the law, the standard here to be taken must of necessity be the standard set by the Articles of War as adopted by the act of Congress. Judging by this standard, the practices of the court-martial, to any candid observer, must be vindicated from the charge of the habitual employment of severity; rather have they proceeded in a direction of a lenient use of their discretion.

But the mind naturally seeks to test this issue of severity by any other accepted standard that may be available, apart from the intangible standards of individual notions. There appear to be two and only two such other standards available. One is the standard to be gathered from former practice in the Army; the other is the standard to be gathered from civil courts. Neither of these is entirely appropriate; but it is my duty to see what light can be thrown by them upon the present subject.

(a) Former practices of courts-martial.—Unfortunately the records available in the printed reports of former years are but scanty in their application to the present purpose. No data as to the length of sentences have been published in the former reports of my office, except in the report for the fiscal year 1917-18, and then only for the offense of desertion. Taking these data for such light as they may give us (Table XIV, page 81, Report of the Judge Advocate General, 1918), we find that the length of sentence did increase gradually during that year. The figures are as follows:

DESERTION.

Month.	Convictions.	Total months' confinement given as part of the sentence.	Average month's confinement (total months' confinement divided by sentences imposed).
1917.
May.....	3	48	15
June.....	8	276	34.5
July.....	17	560	32.94
August.....	27	450	22.5
September.....	44	1,604.75	36.23
October.....	56	2,521.75	45.03
November.....	52	1,863	35.83
December.....	93	5,153	55.25
1918.
January.....	203	9,057	44.43
February.....	202	8,925	30.14
March.....	202	13,068.75	64.55
April.....	228	16,906	73.55
May.....	194	19,109	98.33
June.....	224	24,399	112.96
Total.....	1,553	104,051.25	71.42

It will thus be seen that the average sentence for the year ending June, 1918, was almost exactly six years, as compared with an average of 7.58 years for the period October 1, 1917, to September 31, 1918, and that the average of six years for the period May, 1917-June, 1918, started at between two and three years for the first seven months of the war, and then rose steadily until it was reaching nine years in the fifteenth month of the war.

I do not pretend to be able to interpret the significance of this gradual rise in the average length of sentence for the offense of desertion. So many conditions are involved that any one of several hypotheses may account for the circumstance. I content myself with pointing out, as a possible explanation, the principles already quoted from Brig. Gen. Oakes in his report on desertion in the Civil War, viz. it is quite possible that the military tribunals began with an extremely low penalty, but that as the training of the new forces proceeded in camps a general impression obtained that the protection of the army against the spread of desertion required a somewhat more stringent penalty.

As to any other offenses than desertion, and as to any periods prior to June, 1917, it is not now feasible to ascertain what were the standards of courts-martial sentences in peace-time practices. But inasmuch as a condition of war transforms the whole situation for military discipline and puts into effect the strictest standards of military behavior, it is not possible to presume that the sentence length imposed in former peace-time practice would afford a suitable standard for comparison with war-time practice.

(b) Standard gathered from civil courts: Here it will be necessary to depart from the list of principal military offenses, which have no counterpart in the civil courts, and to resort to the principal civil offenses represented in the military records. The criminal statistics of the United States are but imperfectly organized for study, and the only available record for the present purpose that could be found, after extensive search, is in the report of the Director of the Census for 1910, entitled "Prisoners and juvenile delinquents in the United States." Table 42, at page 64, sets forth the variance in periods of sentences imposed for the various civil offenses. Setting these side by side with the sentences imposed for the corresponding offenses by military courts during the year ending September, 1918, the result is shown in the following Table I.

TABLE I.—Sentences for civil offenses in military and civil courts compared.

1 Hanged.                      2 hanged, 2 commuted.    3 mitigated.                      5, death.
3, death.                      118, death.                      1 mitigated.

In the above table the percentages are the significant items. On the whole, it appears that the percentage of long sentences is greater in the military courts than in the civil courts. For example, in the offense of forgery the sentences of 10 years and over were 15.7 per cent of all sentences, while in the civil courts they were only 3.3 per cent; the sentences for 5 to 9 years were 28.3 per cent, while in the civil courts they were only 11.3 per cent.

But this general trend is marked by so many exceptions that it is hardly open to any general conclusions. For example, in perjury the military court gave a sentence of under one year for 64.3 per cent of the cases, while the civil court gave its lowest sentence in only 28.9 per cent of the cases. Similarly for burglary the military court gave its lowest sentence in a larger percentage of cases than did the civil court. So, too, turning to the highest sentence it appears that murder and manslaughter received less severity of sentence in the military courts than in the civil courts; for murder only 41.7 per cent were sentenced in military courts to the death penalty or life imprisonment, while in the civil courts 86.9 per cent received such penalty; and similarly for manslaughter the percentages of sentence of life imprisonment or imprisonment of 10 years or over or imprisonment from 5 to 9 years were only about half as large as the percentages of the same sentences in the civil courts.

Moreover, it must also be remembered that the moral heinousness and danger of even these civil offenses, common to both codes, varies more or less in military life and civil life. Larceny, for example, which to the civilian mind never receives the deepest measure of reprobation among property offenses, has long been deemed throughout the rank and file of the Army as an intolerable offense, for the safety and mutual confidence of military intimacy as fellow soldiers becomes impossible unless every soldier can be assured that his few and precious belongings can be safely left unguarded in his restricted quarters. In those sections of our country where the horse has always been indispensable to every man's daily occupation, the offense of horse stealing is visited with penalties which seem grossly severe to the residents of other communities; indeed, so far has this principle been carried that in one Southwestern State noted for its splendid horses the law (unless it has been recently changed) permits the owner of a horse to shoot the horse thief while in the act of running away with the property, a privilege not accorded by the law of any other State. It is undoubtedly due to this sentiment that in the table above the offense of larceny is found to be visited with sentences of more than two years in percentages considerably in excess of the percentages found in the sentences of civil courts.

I mention the foregoing instances only as a preface to the general suggestion that the use of longer terms of sentences in military courts than in civil courts for some of the above civil offenses may well be explained by the exigencies of internal military life and by the habitual standards of military conduct known to all soldiers, rather than by any disposition on the part of military tribunals to impose heavier sentences for offenses of an identical nature.

I close this part of my letter, therefore, by noting that the general practices of courts-martial, judged by the maximum sentences allowable by the military code, must be deemed not to merit the charge of excessive severity and that, in my opinion, they rather merit the opposite characterization.

This general condition of things, however, I repeat, must of course be sharply discriminated from the question of the excessive severity of a particular sentence measured in the light of the circumstances of the individual case. That is a question totally irrelevant to the judgment to be passed upon the propriety of the practices of courts-martial in general, as judged by their average treatment of the offenses coming before them.

(2) Variability of sentence.—When we come to the question of variability of sentences we reach a subject which has been the fertile field for complaint and criticism in civil courts for a century past. It is notorious that the independent judgment of different courts and of different juries seems to be characterized by the most erratic and whimsical variety. Such has been the constant burden of complaint in civil justice, and it can hardly be hoped that military justice could escape a similar complaint in some degree. On the other hand, it must always be remembered that here the individual circumstances vary so widely that a variation of sentences is perfectly natural, and that the mere variation of figures in itself signifies very little, where the individual circumstances remain totally unknown to the critic. Nevertheless, a variability of sentences for the same offense is something which naturally excites attention and caution, and it should be the object of appellate authorities to equalize the penalties for the same offense where no obvious reason for substantial difference is found. How far the revisory authority of the Judge Advocate General and the clemency powers of the Secretary of War have been effectual to secure such equalization will be noted later in this letter. At the present the inquiry of fact is whether there has been such variability and at what points it has taken place.

Table A, above referred to and annexed to this letter, summarizes for the nine principal military offenses the variance of the sentences: First, by months of the year covered; and, secondly, by jurisdiction areas from which the court-martial records come up for revision. In summary of these variances, it is here to be noted that such variances obviously exist: that these variances are not in themselves any more striking than those that are found in the sentences of civil courts, as already shown in table B; and that in seeking the possible source of these variances it appears very strikingly that there has been a slight but appreciable increase in the number of higher-period sentences as we come down to the later months of the war; and that, so far as jurisdictional areas are concerned, there have been notable variances which seem, in some cases, to localize the higher-period sentences, for certain offenses, in certain specific areas.

As illustrating the foregoing inferences, it will be sufficient here to take the single offense of desertion. Examining it by months, it will be noticed that the long-term sentences of 10 to 15 years and of 15 to 25 years and over 25 years increase slightly in their ratio to the whole of the sentences for the month as we approach the later months of the year under examination. For example, for the months of October, 1917, to February, 1918, there were no sentences over 25 years, although the number of convictions increased from 55 to 196 (the increase, of course, being due to the much greater ratio in the increase of armed forces). But during the months of April to July, with approximately the same number of convictions, averaging 225, the number of sentences for over 25 years increased from 4 to 9, to 15, and finally to 33. Apparently, therefore, some conditions in the Army changed as the months advanced so as to induce this variance in the direction of higher-period sentences. Just what those conditions were are not even the subject of speculation without a very careful inquiry; merely the fact is here pointed out.

Again, turning to the jurisdictional areas, we find that the Central Department shows about 9 per cent of sentences for over 10 years, while the Eastern Department shows only 3 per cent; that the Twenty-eighth Division, having 21 convictions, imposed no sentences in excess of 10 years, while the Eightieth Division, with exactly the same number of convictions, imposed 14 sentences greater than 10 years.

As further indicating this variance by jurisdiction areas, a glance at the same Table A, under the offense of "absence without leave," shows that in the Twenty-eighth Division, which exhibited the above leniency for desertion, so the offense of absence without leave was given a sentence of under 2 years for 127 out of 140 convictions, while the Eightieth Division, which had shown a large majority of long-term sentences for desertion, was on the other hand, lenient for the offense of absence without leave, imposing 16 sentences of under 2 years out of 20 convictions. Comparing again the Thirty-sixth and Thirty-ninth Divisions, with substantially the same number of convictions, viz, about 175, one finds that the former imposed about 20 sentences of above 10 years, while the other imposed 101 sentences above 10 years. This same Thirty-ninth Division had also used a majority of higher-period sentences for desertion, whereas the Thirty-sixth Division showed for desertion a record that averaged with the other divisions.

It will be seen, therefore, that in many, if not in most cases the extreme variance may be traced to difference of practice in the different jurisdictional areas. Just what conditions existed which would justify in the individual cases, or in the general trend of cases, this variance between divisions can hardly be the subject even of hypothesis. But it must be obvious to any candid observer that there do exist wide differences of conditions, not only in the racial and educational makeup of the different camps, but also in the morale and necessities of discipline prevailing in different camps. It is well known that the sentences of civil courts for civil offenses vary widely in the different States. For example, in 1910 (census report above cited, p. 50), the percentage of sentences of 10 years or over was 9.7 in the East South Central States, but was only 0.1 in the New England States; in Mississippi it was 22.51, but in California it was only 2.3. This illustration is mentioned merely to suggest that whenever one discovers that variances in sentences have a certain relation to variances in camps or divisions, the subject becomes at once too complex for hasty judgment.

Whatever may have been done or may now be contemplated as to the equalization of sentences by commutation in the way of clemency, I am only concerned here to point out the facts as they are found in the records relative to the action of the courts-martial themselves, as are revealed in any noticeable amount, seem to be due most largely to differences of conditions in the different camps, divisions, and other jurisdictional areas, and the greatest caution must be exercised before passing judgment upon such variances and inequalities, without being fully familiar with the conditions operating in those places.

I can not leave this subject without inviting attention to the enlightened tenor of the principles inculcated thoroughly upon the members of courts-martial by the manual which serves as their guide. This manual is required to be studied by all candidates for appointment as officers in the training camp, and a familiarity with its contents is required. Paragraph 342, on the adaptation of punishments, reads as follows:

"In cases where the punishment is discretionary, the best interests of the service and of society demand thoughtful application of the following principles: That because of the effect of confinement upon the soldier's self-respect, confinement is not to be ordered when the interests of the service permit it to be avoided; that a man against whom there is no evidence of previous convictions for the same or similar offenses should be punished less severely than one who has offended repeatedly; that the presence or absence of extenuating or aggravating circumstances should be taken into consideration in determining the measure of punishment in any case; that the maximum limits of punishment authorized are to be applied only in cases in which, from the nature and circumstances of the offense and the general conduct of the offender, severe punishment appears to be necessary to meet the ends of discipline; and that in adjudging punishment the court should take into consideration the individual characteristics of the accused, with a view to determining the nature of the punishment best suited to produce the desired results in the case in question, as the individual factor in one case may be such that punishment of one kind would serve the ends of discipline, while in another case punishment of a different kind would be required."

It is confidently believed that the principles thus inculcated upon members of the courts-martial will be found not to have been substantially departed from when tested by the results shown in the above figures for 1917-18.

4. ATTITUDE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL'S OFFICE AS TO SEVERE OR VARIABLE SENTENCES.

The distinct implication running throughout the remarks of Senator Chamberlain is that there is no central authority which can check, equalize, and correct such severity or variability as may be found to be excessive; in other words, that the Judge Advocate General's Office, charged with the duty of revising these court-martial records either acquiesces in the results of the court-martial sentences as approved by the reviewing authority of the division or department or makes no attempt to check any excesses by revisory action.

It is necessary therefore to emphasize what has been already pointed out above, that the Judge Advocate General's Office scrutinizes the court-martial records for the very purpose of discovering not only errors of law or procedure, but also excesses of sentence. The law section of the military justice division besides scrutinizing the records for errors of law or procedure has from time to time made recommendations, when sending back the record to the reviewing authority, that the sentence be revised. But, furthermore, the clemency section of the military justice division occupies itself exclusively with the scrutiny of records after the man's confinement has begun and an application for clemency has been filed.

But it is not enough to point out the existence of these powers and practices of the Judge Advocate General's Office. Inquiring into the results to see what the facts show I ask: To what extent has the Judge Advocate General's Office called for a reduction of sentence by recommendation of clemency to the Secretary of War?

(1) The extent of such recommendations as to number of sentences will be found by taking the total number of sentences for all offenses classified by length of term, noting the number of these sentences recommended for reduction by clemency by the Judge Advocate General's Office, and then reckoning the percentage of offenses of each length thus reduced. This gives the following results:

TABLE B.—Distribution of sentence reductions by Judge Advocate General's Office according to length of original sentence.

	Total sentences, by length of terms, for 9 principal military offenses, Oct. 1, 1917, to Sept. 30, 1918.	Sentences recommended by Judge Advocate General's Office for reduction, 9 principal military offenses, Jan. 1 to Dec. 31, 1918.
		Number.	Per cent.
Total.....	7,624	947	12.42
Below 2 years.....	3,886	330	8.49
2 to 3 years.....	483	174	36.02
3 to 5 years.....	482	135	28.00
5 to 10 years.....	1,064	197	18.51
10 to 15 years.....	626	68	10.86
15 to 25 years.....	273	33	8.84
25 years or more.....	150	10	6.28

The important thing to notice about the table is that it shows 12 per cent of the total sentences to have been reduced by clemency exercised on recommendation of the Judge Advocate General. I see no reason to doubt that this 12 per cent is ample enough to cover all the individual cases in which an excessive severity would have been apparent on the face of the record.

The above table shows the reduction in its relation to the sentences of different lengths. The table shows that the largest percentage of reduction occurred in the sentences of medium length, and that the smallest percentages of reduction occurred in the sentences of shortest and of longest periods.

This result is perfectly natural and appropriate. The shortest sentences are those in which there would be the least call for reduction by clemency on the ground of excessive severity. The longest sentences are those in which the reduction on the ground of excessive severity would presumably not bring them to an extremely low period and therefore in which the time for recommending such reduction had presumably not arrived.

(2) How much total reduction did this action effect in the total length of all the sentences acted upon? This will afford some gauge of the thoroughness of the action in the nature of clemency. Table C below shows the number of sentences recommended for reduction, the total years of the original sentences, the total years reduced on recommendation of the Judge Advocate General's Office, and the net years of sentence as actually served. The figures are given for the nine principal military sentences, as well as for the total thereof.

Referring to the table for details as to the specific offenses, I will point out here merely that the total reduction effected was a reduction of 3,876 years out of an original period of 4,331 years, or a reduction of 89½ per cent. In other words, action of this office, in effecting reductions in the 1,147 sentences selected on their merits for reduction, cut them down to 10.50 per cent of their original amount. Presenting the same result in another form, the same table shows that the average original sentence of these 1,147 sentences was for a period of 3.78 years (or nearly four years), and that the average sentence as reduced was only 0.40 of one year, or less than five months.

These figures as to reduction effected in the length of the sentences, demonstrate that the action of this office was a radical one, and must have served to eliminate the excessive severity in those sentences. That the sentences selected for such recommendations of clemency included all of the sentences meriting the term "severe" neither I nor anyone else would be in a position either to affirm or deny without a consultation of every record. But I think that it is fair to assume that the scrutiny of the officers of the Judge Advocate General's staff presumably included all of those cases in which an excessive severity was obvious on the face of the record.

5. EFFECTIVENESS OF RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL'S OFFICE.

But the foregoing demonstration of the extent of mitigation of severity effected by the Judge Advocate General's Office, through its recommendations, is vain and meaningless, according to Senator Chamberlain. In his remarks I find it repeatedly asserted and implied that the commanding officer of the division or department—in technical expression, the reviewing authority—is not obliged to follow and does not follow these recommendations. "Court-martial sentences found by the reviewing authorities to be null and void for want of jurisdiction," he states, "have been allowed to stand." "The military commander is not obliged either to ask for legal advice or to follow it when he has asked for it and it has been given to him by responsible law officers of the Army." "Courts-martial should be required to accept the interpretation of the law by a responsible law officer."

Here again we have arrived at a simple question of fact. There is, to be sure, a question of legal theory involved. The records of courts-martial come to the Judge Advocate General to "revise"; and what legal effect this "revision ought to have in theory is a mooted question of law and policy on which it is needless to enter here. Suffice it to say that a difference of view exists and that the judgment expressed by the Judge Advocate General in his appellate capacity is customarily phrased in terms of a recommendation to the commander in the field. But this question, after all, like many questions of fundamental principle, may become practically irrelevant in the light of the facts. The assertion made in Senator Chamberlain's remarks is an assertion of fact, viz, that the commanding officer does not follow the legal advice which is given him and does not accept the rulings of the responsible law officer.

On the question of fact, let the facts themselves answer:

The cases fall necessarily into two groups. One class of cases coming to the Judge Advocate General for revision under United States Revised Statutes, section 1199, the thirty-eighth article of war, and General Order No. 7, January, 1918, require and receive no other revision or approval than that given by the Judge Advocate General. The other class of cases includes all sentences of death and of dismissal of officers, which, under the forty-eighth article of war, require confirmation by the President as well as certain other cases in which error of law has been found, but the execution of the sentence has not been suspended by the reviewing authority. The former class of records go directly back from the Judge Advocate General to the reviewing authority in the field; the latter class of cases go from the Judge Advocate General through The Adjutant General and the Chief of Staff to the Secretary of War, and sometimes to the President. The question of fact is, therefore, in what proportion of cases does purely military authority fail to give effect to these revisory rulings of the Judge Advocate General?

Cases recommended for modification or disapproval on legal grounds. <sup>1</sup>	Number of cases.	Recommendations given effect.		Recommendation not given effect.
		Number.	Per cent.	Number.	Per cent.
To reviewing authority.....	125	121	96.8	4	3.2
To War Department.....	141	135	95.7	6	3.8
Total.....	266	256	96.2	10	3.8

<sup>1</sup> Does not include a few cases in which the recommendation referred only to the place of confinement.

It thus appears that out of a total for the period covered of 266 cases recommended by the Judge Advocate General for disapproval on legal grounds, there were only 10 cases in which the Judge Advocate General's ruling was not followed; of these cases, 4 were not followed by the reviewing authority in the field, and 6 were not followed in the Secretary of War's Office.

In the light of these facts, I think I am justified in asserting that the records disclose no foundation for the assertion which Senator Chamberlain has been led to make. It is not a fact that the military commander or that any military authority proceeds to follow out the dictates of his own discretion regardless "of the interpretation of the law by a responsible law officer," nor that he fails to follow the legal advice "when he has asked for it and it has been given to him by the responsible law officers of the Army." Whatever may be the legal theory of the function now placed by statute in the Judge Advocate General as the law officer or appellate tribunal for military justice in the Army, that theory becomes virtually immaterial in the light of the facts during the period of the war. The state of things supposed by the Senator to exist, simply does not exist. Virtually the recommendations of the Judge Advocate General are given practical effect in the same manner as the trial courts in civil justice give effect to the mandate of the supreme court of the State.

6. MILITARY LAW AS DEPENDENT ON THE MILITARY COMMANDER'S DISCRETION.

But this brings me naturally to the last and most general assertion contained in the Senator's remarks, viz, that the general treatment of accused soldiers is not according to the strict limitations of law as embodied in the military penal code, but is made to depend upon the arbitrary discretion of the commanding officer in each case; or, to use the Senator's own language, "the records of the courts-martial in this war show that we have no military law or system of administering military justice which is worthy of the name of law or justice; we have simply a method of giving effect to the more or less arbitrary discretion of the commanding officer."

As a concrete demonstration of the incorrectness of this assertion, the foregoing facts, taken directly from the records of the courts-martial, appealed to by the Senator; must suffice as a principal refutation. And yet the Senator's remarks call for more than the citation of concrete facts to the contrary. I will, therefore, take the opportunity to point out briefly what general difference does exist between military justice and civil justice.

The substance of my counter assertion is that although the theory of military justice does differ slightly from the theory of civil justice, yet in substance and in practice both of them, in our inherited Anglo-American system, are fundamentally identical, in that justice is founded upon and strictly limited by the requirements and safeguards of strict rules of law.

The only kernel of correctness in the abstract statement of Senator Chamberlain is that the theory of military justice is in its general purpose somewhat different from the theory of civilian criminal justice. The contrast of theory between the two is well set forth in a statement of Gen. William T. Sherman, made 30 years ago, in discussing our Articles of War:

"The object of the civil law," he says, "is to secure to every human being in a community the maximum of liberty, security, and happiness consistent with the safety of all. The object of military law is to govern armies composed of strong men, so as to be capable of exercising the largest measure of force at the will of the Nation."

This definition of Gen. Sherman shows that the objects to be attained are different, in that military justice aims to make the man a better soldier or to eliminate him from the military organization if he can not be improved, while civilian justice looks to the ultimate protection of the community at large.

But, once this difference of theory and purpose is conceded, the two systems proceed in identical method, viz, by the application of strict rules and regulations so drawn as to give equal and fair treatment to all men, and to protect them against mere arbitrary discretion on the one hand and the inflexible rigor of automatic penalties on the other hand.

The former end is attained by a system of courts, procedure, and definitions of offenses, which contains the counterpart of civilian justice in virtually every respect; and which, as already noted, is superior to the civilian system in its ample provision for automatic appellate review in every case. These rules and regulations are fully set forth in the Manual for Courts-Martial; every officer is required to be familiar with this; and a new edition of 50,000 copies, revised to date, was just printed in October.

The other aim, to protect the offender from the harsh consequences of a rigid system of penalties, is secured by the method of indeterminate sentences, i. e., virtually a probationary sentence for every man whose offense is not so heinous as to require immediate separation from the Army. For seven years past, military justice has possessed an indeterminate sentence and probation system which is in advance of that of any State of the Union; for it possesses virtually no minimum limit. How effective it is in mitigating and commuting the sentences originally imposed has been seen in the figures already set forth.

The system of military justice thus established is one of law and orderly procedure, not one of arbitrary discretion of the commanding officer. The proceedings are so conducted as to preserve for scrutiny of the superior authority every point of law which can possibly be raised for the protection of the accused. The accused is furnished a copy of the proceedings on request. This record goes up to the reviewing authority, and then to the Judge Advocate General. The Judge Advocate General's rulings on revision represent the application of all those legal principles which are required by law and regulations to be observed—definition of offenses, organization of the court, due procedure, sufficiency of proof, limitations of penalty, and so on. And the judgment of the Judge Advocate General, embodying those principles, is practically enforced and put into effect by the commanding officers with virtually the same effect as the decision of an appellate civilian court. The picture drawn of an arbitrary commanding officer contemptuously ignoring the limitations of law as embodied in the opinion of the Judge Advocate General is incorrect. In justice to officers of the Army who have in the stress of war acted as convening authorities it should be dismissed from the minds of the American people.

The foregoing figures and facts amply show this. But another and convincing way to understand it would be to read a few records from the Judge Advocate General's Office. They bear all the familiar marks of a record in any civilian court of criminal appeal. Except for the subject being a military offense, the spirit permeating them is essentially not different from that of the records of a civilian court—the same raising of legal questions as to the allegations of the offense, the jurisdiction, the procedure, the evidence, and the judgment. The whole record is redolent of legalism. No one can read these records and not admit that the system of military justice is as full of legal limitations as any civilian system. Some might even infer that the technicalities of civilian criminal law are too prominent. But none could assert the contrary.

That military justice can not be improved in many details could certainly not be maintained. Much might be said on this subject. But neither does any one maintain that civilian justice is perfect. The experience of the past year and a half, when carefully studied, will doubtless reveal numerous details in which improvement of the military code can be secured. It will first be necessary to compare divergent opinions, based on differences of local experience and of important policies. But the same is true of each one of our institutions, civil as well as military, that has passed through the crucible of war time. What we possess is a system of military justice founded on the Constitution, the statutes of Congress, and the President's regulations, administered in the trial courts by officers required to be familiar with it, and scrutinized in the appellate stages by professional lawyers whose sole object is to insure conformity in every substantial detail to those requirements of law.

E. H. CROWDER,
Judge Advocate General.

---

LETTER TO SENATOR CHAMBERLAIN.

FEBRUARY 13, 1919.

HON. GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR CHAMBERLAIN: On the appearance of your remarks in the Congressional Record on January 3, 1919, with reference to the administration of military justice during the war, I at once directed that the Judge Advocate General's Office prepare such data as are available for your information and that of the Senate dealing with the subject. It is not unnatural that so grave a matter as this should attract widespread public attention and that the humane sentiments of Senators and the public should be stirred by such representations as were made to you and formed the basis of your remarks.

In the meantime, as I have happened to be a lawyer and to have had considerable experience as an executive in dealing with the administration of criminal law and of prison discipline, my own attention was not unnaturally attracted to the administration of military justice upon my assumption of the office of Secretary of War. Until the entry of the United States into the European war I found it possible personally to examine the records in most of the cases involving serious penalties. This became impracticable with the increasing demands upon my time, and I therefore came to rely for my action in these matters more and more upon the elaborate reviewing machinery erected in the Office of the Judge Advocate General to deal with these cases, although when any doubt was brought to my attention, either by division of opinion or from outside suggestion, I either personally examined the records or caused them to be independently examined by lawyers whose relation to the subject was purely judicial. It seemed, therefore, quite incredible that any general and widespread perversion of the principles of justice could have crept into a system with the workings of which I was thus familiar and the organization of which seemed to me so well calculated to secure thorough consideration and the application of most humane policies.

The Judge Advocate General has just handed me a letter covering such preliminary examination as he has been able to make of the situation, which is to be followed by a report much more comprehensive in character; but the inquiry so far made has developed a situation which I think ought to be brought to your attention at once and which I have no doubt you will be glad to bring to the attention of the country in order that the interest which has been aroused on this subject will have before it all the facts which ought to be considered before any judgment is formed or any apprehension created on the part of parents or friends of those in the military establishment that soldiers are subject to a harsh and unequal discipline.

In addition to the data presented in Gen. Crowder's letter, I beg leave to express my willingness to produce all other data and information within the control of the department which would be useful or interesting to the members of the committee.

Cordially, yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

LETTER TO MR. LUNN.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 1, 1919.Hon. GEORGE R. LUNN,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. LUNN: I think I can answer your question about the course of military justice during the war more adequately by sending you the inclosed copy of a letter written by Gen. Crowder to me than in any other way. Immediately after the original discussion of the subject in the Senate, I asked Gen. Crowder to give me a comprehensive memorandum covering the whole matter. This letter resulted. Its statements are, I think, most reassuring.

In the meantime, I may say that during the war we investigated and acted upon the cases involving the death penalty and dishonorable discharge from the service. The great number of cases involving long terms of imprisonment could not be circumstantially reviewed under the pressure then existing. The fact of the legality and sufficiency of the trials was inquired into and the cases otherwise put aside for mature consideration. A board of officers organized in the Office of the Judge Advocate General, known as the clemency board, has been at work for some weeks reviewing these postponed matters, and I have already in a good many cases acted upon the suggestion of that board by reducing some of the longer sentences to such terms of imprisonment as would have been imposed for like offenses under the peace-time procedure in force in the department.

Cordially, yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

EXHIBIT 164.

[From Congressional Record, Feb. 19, 1919.]

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, a few days ago I felt called upon to criticize some of the methods of the War Department in regard to the infamous system of courts-martial that were being held in our armies. In the course of those remarks I criticized somewhat severely Gen. Ansell, who had been acting as Judge Advocate General. Facts that have come to my attention since that time have led me to believe that I was perhaps too harsh in that criticism. I have received a letter from Gen. Ansell, and the gentleman who handed that letter to me stated that I was at liberty to place it in the Record. This letter shows much of the activity of Gen. Ansell in trying to reform the infamous system.

It always gives me pleasure when I have done even a partial injustice to anyone, to admit that fact, or make reparation. I do not believe, however, that even from the letter of Gen. Ansell itself that he has been entirely blameless. He shows in the letter that he did make his appeal to Gen. Crowder, to the Chief of Staff, and to the Secretary of War, urging the correction of the system that had grown up, and which he thought, and which I think, beyond question, they had the right to revise and change. He shows that he tried to secure reconsideration in a number of cases, and was overruled. But, Mr. Chairman, my reason for now criticizing him—not so harshly as before—is that, as he knew, that those iniquities were being perpetrated, that those outrages were being committed, he ought to have notified those who were his superior officers and responsible for them that he intended to resign unless such abuses were corrected. Not having done so, I feel that he has not placed himself entirely outside the pale of just and legitimate criticism.

I know what the answer will be. The answer will be that during that time we were at war, and that is true, and that may be a partial mitigation; but we were at war when Senator Chamberlain bravely dared to criticize conditions in the military camps of this country. Attempts were made to call him down. It was even said by high authority that he had forced the Secretary of War to lose his valuable time in going before the committee of the Senate for the purpose of making explanations. But, Mr. Chairman, though that brave Senator may go down to defeat, I believe he will carry with him the blessings of many mothers of soldiers in this country whose lives he saved by that very criticism, because he brought about at least a partial reform in the infamous conditions that existed in the camps. If that action on the part of that brave Senator shall forever retire him to the shades of private life, he will carry with him the consciousness of having saved human lives from the work of heartless tyrants. And I believe that if Gen. Ansell had then said to the War Department, "Unless these things are changed, unless these savageries are discontinued, unless these barbarous and inhuman cruelties are stopped, I will resign my position and expose to the world just what has been going on," I believe it would have had its effect in getting a correction of those conditions.

He would no doubt have been threatened with court-martial; but if the War Department had permitted that outrage, the country would have arisen in such just protest that the threat would never have been executed.

A brave man may be suppressed for a time, but the conscience of honest people, shocked by atrocity and barbarism, will rise to his vindication, and the cowards who seek his destruction will in the end be driven from the seat of power. The wicked and heartless may flourish for a season, but that justice which has its seat in the bosom of God will finally overtake them. It seems from the letter of Gen. Ansell that whenever he tried to treat soldiers like human beings he was called down and overruled. Then, how could he remain in the councils of such Huns? How could he herd with such Attilas?

Mr. Chairman, as he suggests, I was no doubt too harsh in the criticism, and I feel that it is due to me and to this House and to the country that I should read the statement of Gen. Ansell, and thus pillory the Neros responsible for these cruelties before the country.

Only yesterday I received a letter from the War Department in regard to a court-martial sentence that had been brought to my attention. I had placed before them a case where it was stated to me that a young man had, as I thought, been most cruelly sentenced to 20 years at Fort Leavenworth. The reply was that they could not reopen the case now, because more than six months had expired since he made application for clemency, and clemency had been denied. The letter stated that a reexamination at the present time is precluded under War Department orders of August 28, 1907, which prohibit the reexamination of application for clemency within six months of the last consideration, unless new and material reasons therefor are presented. Is that the system under which people in a Christian land, in a civilized country, have to live? Is it possible that the War Department has so tied itself down by inflexible rules that although a most outrageous sentence has been fixed upon a soldier, because it has been six months since clemency had been asked and denied, they could not reopen the case? The letter pointed out that the 18th of May 1919, was as early as he could make another application. Hindenburg and Kaiser Bill could hardly be more cruel. The letter is as follows:

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. Kearns).

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, Gen. Ansell has recognized the injustice that has been done thousands and tens of thousands of private soldiers during this war. These wrongs have been committed in the name of justice through the medium of a military trial. He has come to this Congress and asked us to revise the military laws under which it is made possible for these wrongs to be inflicted on the enlisted man. If any Member of Congress will take the time and has the inclination to go to the War Department and investigate these alleged courts-martial he will come back to his seat in this House denouncing in most unmeasured terms the military law under which the enlisted men have been tried during this war and are still being tried.

We ought not to forget that we still have under arms more than two millions of men. Each one is subject to trial by court-martial upon the charge of violating some frivolous and absurd military rule. I will venture to guess that none of you can read the hearings in the average court-martial but will say that justice is an absolute stranger at these so-called trials.

If we adjourn this congress and leave Gen. Ansell and other officers who want to help him with their hands tied, I do not know what may be the result. If the worst should follow, the responsibility will be at the door of Congress because we have refused to heed his cry of danger.

In this connection I am going to read to you an excerpt from a letter received from the mother of one of these boys who is somewhere in Europe. The mother says:

"I am inclosing you herewith a letter that I have received from my son. Can't these boys be brought home?"

I am thinking that this thought is in the heart of many mothers to-day. I will read now a paragraph from the son's letter which was inclosed:

"This is the worst hole that I ever got into. I sleep on a board floor, as does each private. The officers are well fed while we starve. They have good beds in good quarters. If we complain, we get a court-martial. I have not been up before them yet. Don't know how soon I will be."

Here follows a warning in this letter that every Member of Congress ought to heed. Listen to the voice of this boy as it comes from over the sea. Here is his closing sentence in this paragraph:

"One thing, a time will come when the boys are home, and these officers may never know who got them."

Mr. FERRIS. Does the gentleman think that is a good spirit for the boy to write?

Mr. KEARNS. I am not discussing the spirit of this letter. I am stating a cold fact. I have sympathy for a boy put in this position, where he is made to sleep on a bare floor and the officer is furnished with comfortable quarters and well fed while the boy is being starved. I say most emphatically my sympathy is with the boy.

Mr. FERRIS. Does the gentleman's sympathy extend to the threat to assassinate the officer?

Mr. KEARNS. Of course I have no sympathy with anarchy or lawlessness in any form, but I have read to this House the language of a boy who says he has been made to suffer untold and useless hardships. He says if he complains because he is starving he is brought before a court-martial. Under our present system of courts-martial the chances are he would receive many years at hard labor in prison. To my mind, the entire system is wrong and the hardship of these boys would appeal to a heart of adamant. The only argument that I am trying to advance is the argument that we, this Congress, should act; that we should do something before we adjourn to relieve these boys. No; I am not upholding anarchy, neither do I subscribe to any veiled threat that might be expressed between the lines of the paragraph taken from this letter, whatever that threat may be. I believe in law and order; but I am telling you that these antiquated laws should be repealed. They have come down the centuries from the dark ages. We have tried to rewrite these laws here on two or three occasions within the week by way of amendment to the military appropriation bill, but each time some one made a point of order to the amendment. We wanted to rewrite these laws so that boys would not be compelled to make threats against officers, if indeed they make threats. We wanted to make the enlisted man's liberty just as sacred and as safe as your liberty and mine.

I want to say to you that there is not one private out of one hundred who is tried by a court-martial who stands a ghost of a chance of acquittal if an officer is the prosecuting witness. In support of this statement let me read to you from an argument made by a young officer in defense of his client. Before I do that, and by way of explanation, permit me to say that three officers had testified against the defendant, who was a private. When these officers had finished their testimony the prosecution rested its case. The young lieutenant who was defending the boy did not put his client on the stand, nor did he put any witness on the stand. Here I call your attention to the reason, as he said, why he did not. Let me say in praise of the young lieutenant, who defended this private that he had nerve sufficient to talk straight out from the shoulder to the court. He had the nerve to tell them the situation, the environment in which he found himself in the defense of his client. Listen to the language that he defiantly slings into the very teeth of the court, composed, I think, of about seven officers. And note, too, the silence of the court when, if this statement that follows is not true, the officer making the accusation should have been himself brought to trial. Yet there are high Army officers here in Washington who will tell you this situation does not exist. Listen to the first paragraph of this argument, and then tell me what you think. The language hurled at the court was as follows. Listen to it:

"If the court please, I will take up a few minutes this morning of your time in order to sum up the evidence. I will deal mostly with the evidence of Capt. Williams, the man who prepared the charges and on whose account we are ere this morning. I did not allow the defendant to take the stand behalf"—Let me pause here and ask, Why do you suppose he did it you to listen to the reason why he says he did not allow his ke the stand in his own behalf to rebut the testimony of three ls is what he says:

t allow the defendant to take the stand in his own behalf because at the words of an officer are above reproach (with this court) and idence that the defendant might be able to give would simply be a e."

e first paragraph in the speech made by the counsel for the defendant, cers here in Washington will tell you that what I am saying is et I have quoted from the record of a military trial wherein the as found guilty and sentenced to imprisonment for eight years at and all because an officer's word in a military court "is above All because it would be "a waste of time" to offer testimony of idler in a military court. I say this is disgraceful; this is shame- s Congress ought to deal military autocracy a death blow while s chance. Gen. Ansell has defied this military aristocracy and is o act. Here is a young lieutenant, M. P. O'Keefe, defending a pri- s the nerve to say to the court that he did not put his client on the d because he realized that the word of a private was worthless in ourt as against the word of an officer, and the court sat there and he charge in silence, and by that silence, as we all know, admitted word that Lieut. O'Keefe said was true. [Applause.]

ST OF COL. JOHN A. HULL, JUDGE ADVOCATE, GENERAL STAFF COLLEGE, WASHINGTON, D. C.

WARREN. Now, Col. Hull, will you state your name and ne stenographer?

ll, the members of this committee—that is, of the whole affairs Committee of the Senate—have before them Senate , which was introduced by Senator Chamberlain, providing ral and entire reorganization of the Articles of War, and nmittee is charged with the authority of recommending to mmittee approval or disapproval of changes in that bill, ing changes; and, with the understanding that you had o with the dispensing of justice under the old Articles of hould like to hear from you any suggestions you may have as to that particular bill or as to the Articles of War gen- Perhaps you have seen the Kernan report or the report of can Bar Association's committee. If you wish to refer to rts in any way, we would be glad to have your views.

LL. I might state in introduction, Mr. Chairman, that for 0 years I have been a judge advocate in the United States ; that since last November I have been on special duty as icer of the American Expeditionary Forces, and since my he United States I have been a special student of the Gen- College, so that I have not had an opportunity, such as I ire, before testifying specifically, either to read the bill or he reports mentioned by you.

WARREN. You were on the other side for a year and a half

LL. Yes, sir. During part of that time I was judge advo- S. O. S. I also organized and was for some time a director quisition and claims service, and after the armistice I be- ce officer, as I have stated.

Senator WARREN. You will find in this print, in parallel columns, the present Articles of War and Senator Chamberlain's suggested substitute as contained in the bill.

Col. HULL. I am sorry to say that this is the first time I have seen that. I tried to get a copy of it in France, but it was not available; and since then, as I have said, I have not had the time.

The only report which I have read is the Kernan report, and any dissent that I might have from anything that is mentioned there would be of a very minor character. I believe that it is an excellent report, and have great confidence in the experience and ability of the members of that board.

Senator WARREN. You heard Senator Chamberlain's very able drawing out from the Inspector General of his opinion as to a style of appellate court, if I may term it such. We should like to hear your views about that; whether there should be greater power of revision in the hands of the Judge Advocate General, or whether there should be another man or body of men who could take up these cases for final adjustment. As stated here a few minutes ago, there seems to be no real controversy in the minds of those in question that there should be an appellate tribunal with powers to correct any injustice that might appear.

Col. HULL. Personally, I am firmly of the opinion that if that work is to be well done, for the benefit of the country, it should be subject to the control of the constituted authorities. In 20 years' experience as a judge advocate I have been fortunate in serving, as a rule, with the older and more experienced general officers of the Army. With only one have I discussed to any great degree legal questions, and that was Gen. Otis, commanding general of the Philippines, who was a distinguished lawyer in civil life before he became an officer in the Army, and whose judgment on both law and facts was of the highest order.

With the other officers in whose staff I have served, as a rule their comments have been only in applying the law to the facts, based on their long experience in the Army and their sound judgment of men and affairs. There are many court-martial cases where a knowledge of military conditions surrounding the camp and garrison is necessary for a correct understanding of the testimony, and I am sure that a body of civilian lawyers, no matter how sound they might be both in law and their experience in civil affairs, would in many cases fail to give proper estimation, either for or against the accused, to the soldier language used by the witnesses.

Senator WARREN. Senator Lenroot is very much interested in the discussion that has come up on the floor of the Senate, and he asked me to say that he wishes us to go on without him, as he will read all the testimony taken. He will be in later if possible.

Col. HULL. If you will permit me to say so, I have seen in the public press a number of statements that would indicate that some of the witnesses before the committee have almost the impression that the average officer of the Regular Army, as well as the average officer during this world's war, almost took a pleasure in treating the enlisted men under his command in a harsh and cruel way, and with special reference to courts-martial. I doubt if such statements have made any impression upon the committee, as the officers of the Army have sworn to perform their duties in just the contrary way:

and, leaving aside the sense of duty, a man's self interest as a commanding officer would require him to treat his men justly and fairly; as otherwise he can not have a well-disciplined command.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What were your functions, Colonel, in the Judge Advocate General's office here? Did you review cases that came up from commanding officers?

Col. HULL. I have had little or no service in the Judge Advocate General's office at Washington in my 20 years' service.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It has always been with the line?

Col. HULL. It has always been at department headquarters, as a rule. I was here in Washington one year in which I was mainly connected with Philippine affairs, and with the Manassas maneuvers and the claims for rental and damages growing therefrom.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You have not had much experience, then, in connection with cases which come up for review?

Col. HULL. No, sir; except this, that probably, in the 20 years, I have sent to Washington over 20,000 cases.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is, cases where the approval of the commanding officer had been had?

Col. HULL. Yes, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Either of convictions or acquittals?

Col. HULL. Yes, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And practically all of those cases were approved here?

Col. HULL. So far as I know. I have never had a case returned to me from Washington, pointing out a fatal error.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You do know this, Colonel, that under the construction of the law as it has been interpreted by Gen. Crowder, the only power that the Judge Advocate General has, where the court had jurisdiction and where the trial was regular, is to advise the commanding officer only as to the merits of the case?

Col. HULL. Either that, or submit the case to the Secretary of War for his action.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; but he really had no appellate tribunal for errors of law occurring at the trial?

Col. HULL. In question of language, no. Practically, yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What I am trying to get at is the fact. If the trial was wrong in the court below, if the court-martial proceedings were wrong—if the trial was wrong, but if the court had jurisdiction—then the Judge Advocate General, under his theory of the law, had no power to undertake to correct the trial or to criticise the sentence?

Col. HULL. No; nor would the appellate court have that power, under the facts as given by you.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. A civil court?

Col. HULL. Not if the case was regular, and there was nothing the matter with it.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Well, prejudicial error—I will put it that way. That is what the Judge Advocate General holds, that if the trial was regular and the court had jurisdiction he has no power other than to advise. I was using the language of that office.

Col. HULL. No.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Even if there was prejudicial error committed against the defendant, and the commanding officer had approved the judgment, under the theory of the Judge Advocate General, he still had no power to set aside or revise or modify that sentence?

Col. HULL. Personally, no.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You say "personally." Has he officially?

Col. HULL. He has the official duty to report the error to the Secretary.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. To whom?

Col. HULL. To the Secretary of War.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; but the Secretary of War does not claim that he has any right to reverse.

Col. HULL. There have been, during my experience, a great many thousands of men whose sentences have been modified by the Secretary of War.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Clemency has been shown them?

Col. HULL. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. But there have been no reversals in judgment?

Col. HULL. Except where the sentence has been held to be illegal for error of form, as a rule.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you think there ought to be any appellate jurisdiction anywhere?

Col. HULL. As I said, I believe in it; yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Where ought it to be?

Col. HULL. I should say in the Judge Advocate General's office, with power to report to the Secretary of War.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you agree with Gen. Crowder's construction of section 1199 of the Revised Statutes, or do you agree with Gen. Ansell's view of it?

Col. HULL. That question arose first to my mind definitely when I was on my way to France. Gen. Ansell spoke to me about it and told me the general views. My impression at that time was that if the case had been de novo, Gen. Ansell had a very strong position, but that in view of the construction that had been made and the years of practice that had taken place, I thought his position was greatly weakened.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. In what respect; what practice?

Col. HULL. Namely, from the time of the statute and the original construction, a practice that had grown from that time on, that the power to revise did not mean what Gen. Ansell claimed it did.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I believe that is all that I want to ask, Mr. Chairman.

Senator WARREN. Unless you have something you wish to say, Colonel, that is all.

Col. HULL. Yes; I have.

Senator WARREN. In that case we should be very glad to have you proceed, and we wish you to feel free to comment upon anything that is before us. Our duties are not in connection with anybody's differences, but they are to get before the Congress—and first before the main Committee on Military Affairs—the best form of bill to correct errors in the present law and practice, or the law which creates the practice.

Col. HULL. I have also seen in the newspapers an impression given out regarding the trial of the mutineers at Houston, Tex. I was the central department and sent to San Antonio, Tex., advocate to prepare the case of the United States and to men. The impression has been given that there was no their case and that those 13 men were improperly hung. entire trial a copy of the daily evidence was given to the cate of the Southern Department, and a copy was also Judge Advocate General.

WARREN. At Washington?

L. At Washington, D. C. Col. Dunn, the judge advocate thern Department, detailed an assistant of his, a lawyer life, to review this case, and this officer had no other cept to carry on a current review of the case as the case court was lawfully constituted. The case was well and vigorously nd prosecuted, and was defended with equal skill and vigor. The rules of procedure governing trials by courts-martial were carefully observed, and the record is singularly free from evidence that is irrelevant or of doubtful competency. The record is lengthy, comprising 2,172 pages of typewritten matter, besides 67 exhibits and 63 charge sheets. It has been read and studied with much care and deliberation because of the very great importance of the case, and the conclusion has been reached that the defendants had a fair and impartial trial, and that the convictions and sentences imposed were authorized by law and fully sustained and justified by the evidence.

JAMES J. MAYES.

Acting Judge Advocate General.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN, You speak of the newspapers having said that these executions were unjust or improper—something of that kind. I have not hesitated to say in public, and possibly the newspapers have referred to that, that such a condition as that ought not to be permitted to exist in the Military Establishment or any establishment in a democratic form of government; and I repeat that. I am glad the court has an apologist in you for the proceedings that were had, Colonel. But, as a matter of fact, you speak of the abstract of the evidence being furnished the judge advocate of the department each day and copies of it being furnished to the Judge Advocate General each day here in Washington. I assume that that was not an official forwarding of the case for review to the Judge Advocate General, was it?

Col. HULL. Oh, no; it was not an abstract of the testimony. It was a verbatim copy.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. But even if that was done, the Judge Advocate General had no power to act or recommend on that testimony, did he?

Col. HULL. No; but I did that not because it was required by law, but in addition to what was required by law.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Well, what was required by law?

Col. HULL. Only that the record should be forwarded at the completion of the trial.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; but the complete record was not forwarded until after the men had been executed, was it?

Col. HULL. It was forwarded to the convening authority, as required by law, as soon as I could prepare it.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. But that was not forwarded to the Judge Advocate General until after they were executed?

Col. HULL. No; and it was not required by law.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Possibly not; but suppose that the record had been forwarded to the Judge Advocate General, as the law contemplated it would be eventually, and he had found that the court was without jurisdiction, or that it was improperly constituted; it would have been too late for him to have said so, because the men were executed, would it not?

Col. HULL. Yes; certainly.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is the injustice that I am speaking of. I do not mean to charge the individual officers with unfairness, but I say that was a condition that ought not to be permitted to exist. Now, the very fact that those men were executed before the record reached Washington led to the adoption of a rule to prevent it, did it not?

Col. HULL. General Order No. 7.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; so that thereafter, because of that case, because of the apparent chance for injustice to be perpetrated.

Department and the commander in chief issued General Order No. 7, which required that all of these proceedings should be referred for review prior to the execution of the sentence?

MR. TULL. Yes.

CHAMBERLAIN. Which was very proper. Do you think that condition ought to be allowed to exist where a man could be executed before the reviewing authority had a chance to examine the record?

MR. TULL. That condition exists, I think, in pretty nearly every army; it has existed in every army up to this time.

CHAMBERLAIN. I beg your pardon; it does not exist in the British Army or in the French Army, and it does not exist now in the United States, because of General Order No. 7; and it ought not to exist anywhere, if you will permit me to say so.

MR. TULL. I can imagine conditions at the front where, even in the British Army, there were executions without review.

CHAMBERLAIN. Oh, yes; there was a case cited here where a man was convicted in the British retreat from Mons and was executed within 24 hours after he was caught. I can conceive of such a case here where the country was at peace.

MR. TULL. It was hardly a condition of peace existing in this case.

CHAMBERLAIN. I think there was. And then, of course, there was the case of an honest disagreement of minds.

MR. TULL. But what I was trying to get at and show was that the law was complied with as it then existed, and that the officers charged with the unpleasant duty down there discharged it according to the law and according to their oaths, and according to their conscience and their God.

CHAMBERLAIN. That may be true; but here was section 11 of the Revised Statutes that provides in terms that the Judge Advocate General should have power to do certain things. Now, he did not have a chance to do those things. There was no rule that he should have the chance, but the law was there and it should have been complied with. In other words, the law stated that before a man was executed the Judge Advocate should have an opportunity to look at the record.

MR. TULL. There were a great number, as I believe the records show, during the Civil War of cases where men were executed without reference of their cases to Washington.

CHAMBERLAIN. I can conceive of cases where it might be proper during war times. But there was no excuse for it.

MR. TULL. Now, you had a witness in front of you, Mr. Thomas, who made certain comments on the operation of the Judge Advocate's Department in the S. O. S. He speaks, on pages 301 and 302 of the record, of an officer who was alleged to have been at Tours. Although he states that his papers have been lost, he attempts to quote in extenso the words of a Maj. Elmore, who was assistant judge advocate at Tours for a time. I do not know how I have this exact language and not be able to give the exact language. I have tried to remember a case somewhat similar, and one of my assistants, who has been in town, also tried to remember the facts of the case, but without our papers we have been unable to do so.

CHAMBERLAIN. There was the case of an officer who picked up an enlisted man. Now, you had a witness in front of you, Mr. Thomas, who made certain comments on the operation of the Judge Advocate's Department in the S. O. S. He speaks, on pages 301 and 302 of the record, of an officer who was alleged to have been at Tours. Although he states that his papers have been lost, he attempts to quote in extenso the words of a Maj. Elmore, who was assistant judge advocate at Tours for a time. I do not know how I have this exact language and not be able to give the exact language. I have tried to remember a case somewhat similar, and one of my assistants, who has been in town, also tried to remember the facts of the case, but without our papers we have been unable to do so. There was the case of an officer who picked up an enlisted man as a barroom acquaintance, and at closing time left the café with two Frenchwomen and went to a questionable rooming house, and remained absent without leave for two or three days, and kept the enlisted man with him, absent from duty. He was tried and dismissed, according to my recollection of the case, and I believe should have been. I have no recollection of the language as quoted by Mr. Thomas. I do know, however, that Maj. Elmore was without authority to represent the Judge Advocate General's Department by the use of any such language as is alleged.

He also speaks of the general conditions that existed at Gièvres in the prison camp there. I drafted the instruction for the establishment, and the rules governing, the prison camp at Gièvres, under general instructions from Gen. Kernan. The officer in charge was an exceedingly able, conscientious, and hard-working officer.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Was that "Hard-Boiled" Smith?

Col. HULL. No, sir; that was Col. C. J. Symmonds, of the Regular Army. Gen. Kernan's ideas were set forth in full in these instructions, and I am sorry that I have not a copy of them with me. They provided for segregation of the prisoners, both as to the character of the offenses, and also as to white and black, to prevent any trouble; and also gave the commanding officer power to further subdivide them in order to work out the general scheme of the prison camp, which was to restore the men to duty at as early a date as practicable, as one of the main problems then confronting the senior officers of the Army in France was man power.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Have you seen the report of the commission that was over there?

Col. HULL. No.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. On the conduct of the Gièvres prison?

Col. HULL. On Gièvres?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Col. HULL. No; they were talking about Schelle, were they not?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. They were talking about all of them. Do you know whether the regulations that you prepared were lived up to or carried out at the prison?

Col. HULL. I was going to say that I was down there twice subsequently and went through the prison camp, and talked to some of the prisoners, and talked to the commanding officer, whom I have known for a great many years, and also talked to several of the officers who were directly concerned in the management of the prison.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Of course, that is not in this hearing.

Col. HULL. I do know that the effort was to restore as many of these men to duty as it was possible to restore; that there was segregation of the prisoners according to character of offenses; and to make it still simpler, the restoration to duty, the authority to restore, was given into the hands of the commanding general of the intermediate section.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. But that was only the exercise of mercy, of clemency, was it not?

Col. HULL. No; not any more than the exercise of mercy and clemency is coming through the disciplinary barracks.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. But if any of those men had been convicted, there was no power here to correct the judgment, was there?

Col. HULL. I was talking about this testimony of Mr. Thomas, primarily; the testimony here that those things were not done over there to try to restore the men to duty. On the other question, of course, they followed the actual line according to the law as written in the statutes. But I do know that they did restore to duty a great number of men from Gièvres.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Oh, yes; Gen. Crowder promised in February last, when he was before this committee, that there would be a general jail delivery within 60 days. I say that is an argument confirming the injustice of the system. Why deliver the jails if all these convictions had been just?

Col. HULL. I was not talking about the jail delivery at Gièvres, Mr. Senator; I was talking about the fact that in regard to those convicted and sent there we at once established a policy so that we could get as many of those men out of confinement and back on the line as the best officers that we had there could possibly do; that instead of trying to see how many men we could get into jail, we were anxious—those in authority—to see how many we could restore to duty.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; one of those young men that was ordered to be shot over there was restored to duty and was afterwards killed in battle. Better to die as a hero than to die as a felon for sleeping at his post!

Senator WARREN. You speak of the "jail." As I understand it, as the word "jail" is used, it means the disciplinary barracks, and it would convey a little different meaning from the ordinary.

Col. HULL. Oh, yes.

Senator WARREN. What was this you speak of? It was a disciplinary barracks, you say?

Col. HULL. It was on the order of a disciplinary barracks.

Senator WARREN. Yes.

Col. HULL. The regulations of the department then required that all men convicted and sentenced to dishonorable discharge be returned to the United States. That was a loss of man power, as in spite of the high character of the enlisted force in the American Expeditionary Forces, there were some unworthy members that were desirous of getting, as they called it, a "sentence overseas."

Senator WARREN. To get home through that?

Col. HULL. To get home and avoid service in France.

Senator WARREN. Did not that occur more from the draft, which took in material of all sorts, the bad with the good? Did not that occur there more than in the Regular Army?

Col. HULL. Oh, Senator, no one can appreciate the very fine character of the enlisted force as a whole in France unless he has been over there and served with them and seen them.

Senator WARREN. I think that got to us.

Col. HULL. But notwithstanding that this was the first pressing of the grape of our young manhood, there were some members, of course, that had to be segregated from the others.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The commanding officer over there was given power to do that very thing.

Col. HULL. Now, also, in Mr. Thomas's testimony, if the committee will permit me, he says there was a regular policy in the S. O. S. of trying men by special court, and he charges that—let me get his exact language. On page 303 he states as follows:

They would pile up the charges in the special court.

It is doubtless unnecessary to call your attention to the fact that that practice is forbidden in the manual of courts-martial, and I am certain that no such practice obtained in the S. O. S., especially so at a camp so near the headquarters of the intermediate section. The orders were that a man convicted and sentenced to more than three months was at once to be sent to the camp; and to have held him there for repeated trials and to have given him six months on each trial would have at once been detected by the authorities. The judge advocate at Gièvres, Capt. Adams, was a civilian alwyer from Massachusetts, and as industrious and careful an assistant as I had under me.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Were you the judge advocate general of that department?

Col. HULL. Yes, sir. There were six or seven jurisdictions under me that had judge advocates that had authority to convene general courts-martial.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Was Gièvres in your jurisdiction?

Col. HULL. Gièvres; yes, sir. It was in the intermediate section of the S. O. S.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What was your departmental jurisdiction called?

Col. HULL. The S. O. S.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You were not connected with the line of the Army?

Col. HULL. I served on Gen. Kernan's staff, and afterwards on Gen. Harbord's staff as judge advocate of the S. O. S.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Were you the superior officer in the Judge Advocate General's Department on it?

Col. HULL. Yes, sir; from February until November.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You did not have much to do with the court-martial cases, did you?

Col. HULL. Every officer's case, and every case of an enlisted man sentenced to five years or more, I personally read, in spite of the fact that they had already been formally reviewed in my office—that is, of the cases that came through our headquarters, under the law and orders.

There was another case here where Mr. Thomas comments. On page 313 and on the bottom of page 314 he speaks of Gen. Patrick's review of a case. According to my recollection, Gen. Patrick at no time in France exercised general court-martial jurisdiction.

The greatest difficulty with the administration of military justice that I have encountered in 20 years has been the lack of trained officers as judge advocates, as counsel, and the absence of proper stenographers.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is all the more reason why there ought to be an appellate jurisdiction, is it not?

Col. HULL. I am in favor of an appellate tribunal. Mr. Senator, as I said some time ago. But I mean, that has been in the administration the greatest difficulty that we have met. I have in mind only one case where I believe an innocent man was convicted and sentenced to confinement, and in that case he was convicted on the direct testimony of two witnesses. The members of the court themselves subsequently testified that they believed that an injustice had been done. That kind of a conviction would have taken place under any system; namely, two witnesses had lied against a man.

Senator WARREN. Every man on trial has his counsel of his own selection, if possible, or perhaps I ought to say, always his own if it is at all practicable. If he does not select counsel, the court appoints counsel for him, does it?

Col. HULL. The post commander as representing the convening authority.

Senator WARREN. Now, suppose that counsel should be an enlisted man, suppose that an enlisted man should ask that his counsel might be another enlisted man or a noncommissioned officer; are they permitted to serve?

Col. HULL. They are permitted to serve. That has occurred only rarely and in the case of the emergency forces.

Senator WARREN. Is there any discrimination against enlisted men as compared with officers, in service of that kind, if the accused himself chooses to select an enlisted man?

Col. HULL. I should say not. The duty of counsel is a well recognized duty, and if properly performed, meets with no objection from anyone in authority.

Senator WARREN. Senator Chamberlain, have you anything further?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Nothing more, Senator.

(Thereupon, at 12.30 o'clock p. m., the subcommittee adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, October 24, 1919, at 10.30 o'clock a. m.)

ESTABLISHMENT OF MILITARY JUSTICE—PROPOSED AMENDMENT OF THE ARTICLES OF WAR.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 24, 1919.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C.

The committee met, pursuant to the call of the chairman, in the room of the Committee on Appropriations at 10.30 o'clock a. m., Senator Francis E. Warren presiding.

Present: Senators Warren (chairman) and Lenroot.

Senator WARREN. We have with us this morning Gen. Crowder; and we are ready to hear you now, General.

STATEMENT OF MAJ. GEN. ENOCH H. CROWDER, JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL, UNITED STATES ARMY.

Senator WARREN. Gen. Crowder, this is a subcommittee of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate, having under consideration the so-called Chamberlain bill, which Senator Chamberlain says was originally the Ansell bill, and the report of the Kernan-O'Ryan-Ogden Board on that bill, and also what report has been made, so far as we have gone in considering the subject, by the American Bar Association; and, in fact, as I understand it, and I think my colleagues understand it the same way, we are to report to the full committee our suggestions or judgment, first, as to whether the present Articles of War are all that they should be and, second, how shall we change them, if at all, and if we change them, whether we shall take in whole or in part these other bills that have been proposed; and, of course, we want to hear from you along the lines of the present law and how it should be changed, if at all, and other things which you may wish to bring before the committee.

Gen. CROWDER. The problem with me is to discover just what will be responsive to the condition of the minds of the members of this subcommittee; if possible to find some way of testifying within the field of what is relevant to the inquiry which remains in your minds.

This court-martial controversy—and I believe it has been called such in your proceedings—had its beginning within the War Department with the filing of the November, 1917, briefs, which were addressed to the question of appellate power in the Judge Advocate General to reverse, modify, or affirm the sentences of courts-martial. It had its beginnings as a public controversy with the speech delivered by Senator Chamberlain on December 30, 1918, withheld by him for revision, and published in its revised form in the Congressional Record of January 3, followed closely by an interview given out by the president of the American Bar Association, Mr. Page, on January 4, 1919, announcing what he called the archaic character of the then existing military code, pronouncing it a code unworthy of the name of law or justice, and stating his intention to investigate the facts connected with its administration through a committee of the American Bar Association appointed by himself.

From that time the matter has been before the public, and there has been a torrential flow of criticism, accusation, and defamation impugning the motives of men who have helped to administer military justice during the period of this World War, until the real issues of the controversy are to-day somewhat obscured.

It will be my effort to keep without that field of accusation and defamation, and within the field of what is relevant; but these personal accusations, personal defamation, and this impugning of the motives of men who have helped administer military justice, are so interwoven and blended with the issues of that controversy that I may not be altogether successful in addressing you always on the matters that are vital to a proper revision of the code; for, of course, no one thinks we have come out of this unprecedented World War without knowing that there are many respects in which the existing code may be improved. I recognize the necessity for revision, and I hope to be able to place before the committee, as I progress in my remarks, much needed amendments to the existing code.

Now, because there are so many issues of fact in this controversy which are rapidly developing into questions of personal veracity, I would like to ask, Mr. Chairman, if it is consistent with the rules of your committee, that I be sworn.

Senator WARREN. I see no reason why the witness should not be sworn.

Senator LENROOT. If the witness desires it. It is not the custom; it is to be taken for granted, but if the witness desires it, I see no objection.

(The witness was here sworn by Senator Warren.)

Gen. CROWDER. I also want to place in the record at this point an expression of regret that I am not able to proceed now and at all times in the presence of Senator Chamberlain and subject to his cross-examination. I hope that in the discussion of these more vital issues he may be present and interrogate me, particularly on questions of fact.

Senator WARREN. We shall try to have him with us later in the hearings.

Gen. CROWDER. Now, if left to follow my own method in presenting this whole subject, I think I could classify all legitimate criticism of the Articles of War and the administration of military justice that I have heard or read under two heads—first, excessive sentences; second, illegal convictions. I propose to address myself first to the question of excessive sentences and to reserve what I have to say about illegal convictions until we come to discuss this question of appellate power, which I think is relied upon by all of you as the proper method of correcting the evil of illegal convictions.

I do not know how you can understand, or how anybody can understand, whether a sentence is excessive or not, or the degree to which it is excessive, until you know something of our military penology; that is, of the disciplinary barracks régime, at which barracks are executed all of the sentences of general courts-martial for major offenses against the discipline of the Army. Therefore, I shall talk first about the disciplinary barracks.

Senator WARREN. May I ask you a question right there?

Gen. CROWDER. Yes, sir.

Senator WARREN. You speak of disciplinary barracks. In this country there has been a good deal said about the jails over in France and our men being confined in jails. Do you understand that they are jails as separated from disciplinary barracks, or are those so-called jails branches, in reality, or practically, of our system of disciplinary barracks in this country?

Gen. CROWDER. I understand they are improvised places having no connection with disciplinary barracks. There is authority given by act of Congress to designate branches of the main disciplinary barracks at Leavenworth, a discretion which has been exercised to establish branches in two places—Alcatraz and Castle William, respectively, at San Francisco and at Governors Island, New York; but I do not know that it has been exercised abroad.

Senator WARREN. Do you understand that the conduct of those jails, which has been complained of, was along the line of disciplinary barracks?

Gen. CROWDER. No, I do not; I am not prepared to speak of those places established as I suppose by the commanding general of the expeditionary forces in France.

Senator WARREN. The reason I ask is because we have had it testified that men were kept there to be returned to their duties when their conduct was such that they should be relieved.

Gen. CROWDER. It is to be supposed that they were organized along the same lines; but I can not speak of that. Gen. Bethel, who has been before you, probably could tell you about that, but I have no knowledge of the subject, and I have no means of informing myself as to what régime was adopted for the conduct of those improvised places in the theater of war.

When I finish what I have to say on the subject of disciplinary barracks and of the régime that prevails there, the treatment of military offenders confined there, this committee will know whether or not there are sentences of 40 years, 25 years, 20 years, 15 years, 10, or even 5, that are to be served as penal servitude—that is, to be satisfied only by actual imprisonment at hard labor for 40, 25, 20, 15, 10, or even 5 years; and I hope that I shall be able to place the matter upon the basis of conceded or demonstrated fact, and that no longer will the public imagination be inflamed with the view that we are exacting penal servitude for fixed periods in cases of our military offenders.

Finishing with this subject of our disciplinary barracks system and the penology in force there, I shall next take up for discussion the applicability or nonapplicability of the Bill of Rights to accused military persons. Much has been said to this committee and much has been printed in the public press on that subject. It has been represented that military accused are denied protection that civil accused get before our civil courts, and the public has been asked to deduce from this fact a kind of military tyranny characterizing the administration of military justice.

When I finish with the Bill of Rights, I shall take up the subject of courts-martial as executive agencies, and I hope, when I have finished my discussion of that subject, this committee will know whether or not there is any merit in the statement that military tribunals are dictated to by military commanders.

I shall then pass to the consideration of the question of jurisdictional and prejudicial error before courts-martial; and when I have finished with that subject I want to test out by further discussion the accuracy of certain statements that have been made to this committee on the subject of the English and French systems of military justice, and particularly the use of high prerogative writs as a means of correcting judgments of courts-martial.

I shall pass from that to a discussion of the November briefs of 1917, and then take up the pending bill. My discussion of the pending bill will assume the commission of an offense—the offense of disobedience of orders—and pass under review the successive steps of a trial under the code you are now considering, called the Chamberlain bill.

I think, when I have finished with my discussion along these lines there will be one and only one large question left upon which there will be any difference of opinion and that will be where this appellate power, which we all concede must be created, shall be located.

Now, gentlemen, as I have outlined my method of presentation of the general subject, I would like to ask whether, if I pursue that method, it will be responsive to the condition of mind of the committee?

Senator LENROOT. I think it is exactly what we would like.

Senator WARREN. I think just what you have stated, all of it, and especially the last part of it, is what we need most information on.

Senator LENROOT. I would be glad to have you, General, go through the whole course which you have just outlined.

Gen. CROWDER. It may take more than a day.

Senator LENROOT. I understand; but I think it is very important.

Senator WARREN. I think Senator Lenroot will agree with me that we shall give you all the time you want, and we may have to extend your hearing over more than one day, because we are called upon the floor of the Senate at various times.

Gen. CROWDER. Yes. First, as to excessive sentences. Frankness requires that it be conceded that there have been many—too many—excessive sentences. Five, 10, 15, 20, 25, and even 40-year sentences have been given for the principal offenses of desertion, absence without leave, sleeping on post, assaulting a superior officer, assaulting a noncommissioned officer, disobeying a noncommissioned officer, disobedience of standing orders; disobedience of an officer; but in judging the system we must take into consideration that the average sentences imposed by general courts-martial for the year October, 1917, to September, 1918, were: For desertion, a capital offense, 7.58 years; for absence without leave, 1.59 years; for assaulting a superior officer, 4.1 years; for assaulting a noncommissioned officer, 2.36 years; for disobedience of a noncommissioned officer, 3.04 years; for disobedience of an officer, 4.34 years; for disobedience of standing orders, 1.96 years. We get, therefore, a very erroneous impression from citing the relatively few cases of excessive sentences of longer duration than the average. In other words, the question is, shall courts-martial be judged by the exceptional cases, or by the average record they have made? The answer is, of course, by both; but the explanation for the exceptional case lies in the facts of that case, which it has been very difficult to get before the committee, and which involves——

Senator LENROOT. You asked whether they should be judged by the average record, or the exceptional record, and then you said by both; because you certainly would not intimate that we should judge by the average record alone.

Gen. CROWDER. No.

Senator WARREN. You speak of that length of sentence. Does that mean the actual service? Of course they have not served their length of time; but take those that have served their time and those who are still under confinement. Does this represent the findings of the court without deducting suspensions?

Gen. CROWDER. Without deducting for any clemency at all.

Senator LENROOT. That is, the average original sentence?

Gen. CROWDER. Yes; the sentence as approved.

Senator WARREN. That is it; you have stated it better than I.

Gen. CROWDER. The public has been misled in another important regard. These excessive sentences have been commented upon as if they were absolute fixed sentences, to be served by 5, 10, 15, 20, 25, and even 40 years of actual imprisonment at hard labor. I have seen them referred to in the Congressional Record and in the public press as prison and penitentiary sentences. No adequate mention has been made of Disciplinary Barracks at which they are to be served, or of the indeterminate character of these sentences, of the system of parole in force at our disciplinary barracks, and only minor mention has been made of the system of restoration to duty with which good conduct at the disciplinary barracks while undergoing sentence is rewarded. So that these essential characteristics do not at all enter into the popular conception of our military penology. I want the committee to understand, and the country to understand, that practically all offenders against the discipline of the Army have received, in fact, indeterminate sentences to be executed not in penitentiaries or prisons but in the disciplinary barracks; and I want the committee, and through the committee the country, to understand our system of military penology in force at these barracks, including the parole system in force there. I shall first take up the subject of disciplinary barracks.

Senator Chamberlain remarks, on page 248 of the hearings, that——

The only real reform in the articles of 1916 was that which admitted the creation of the disciplinary barracks where young men who had been convicted by courts-martial might be restored to the colors.

And, in the subsequent colloquy between him and Gen. Ansell it is made to appear that that "real reform" grew out of an opinion rendered by Gen. Ansell in the construction of the military prison statute of 1873. In truth, the whole plan of prison reform and restoration had been formulated before Gen. Ansell had reported for duty at Washington. I propose to give an accurate history of the development of that reform, because unless it is understood and Congress and the people are made aware of the military penology practiced at these barracks no judgment can be formed as to the severity of the sentences which have been imposed by our courts-martial to be served in these barracks.

Let me say, preliminarily, that I am prompted to present this in some detail by the request of a Senator who visited my office and who was so much in ignorance of what our system of military penology was, that, upon hearing the explanation of it, he asked that this matter be placed before the public in some way so as to lift the cloud of general misunderstanding that rests over the whole subject.

I became Judge Advocate General on February 15, 1911. A controversy had been going on for years as to the treatment of military prisoners, particularly deserters. Annual reports, service journals, and the public press were filled with discussions of the general subject. One class of Army officers, perhaps the majority, believed in punishment for deterrent effect; another class favored reformatory methods. Because of the relations of this subject to the administration of military justice, I asked for orders to proceed to Fort Leavenworth, the main branch of our military prisons, and make an investigation. This investigation took place in October of 1911, and the report is dated November 17, 1911.

I first gave attention to the statute law, the act of 1873, establishing the prison and prescribing its government. I found that the organic act followed closely the legislation of the States of the Union for the establishment and maintenance of penitentiaries. Indeed, in some respects the law establishing the prison was less humane than later legislation of the United States establishing penitentiaries at Leavenworth, McNeil Island, and Atlanta; and the same illiberal rigid character must be ascribed to regulations adopted from time to time by the War Department in aid of the execution of this military prison statute. In these regulations the War Department had uniformly interpreted the law as requiring the prison to be administered as a penal institution. The prisoners were required to be clad in the usual prison-striped clothing, to wear their hair close-cropped, their faces clean-shaven, to be designated by numbers, and to be employed at the kind of daily hard labor at which convicts confined in civil prisons and penitentiaries are customarily employed.

I found 940 ex-soldiers in confinement at the Leavenworth branch. I asked to have them paraded, and, when I passed down the line, I was struck with their youthful appearance. I ascertained that the average age of these 940 men at the time of their commitment was about 23 years. Classified in accordance with the nature of the offense for which committed, I found 667, or about 71 per cent, had been committed for purely military offenses—that is, offenses against the discipline of the Army—195 for military offenses in connection with common-law and statutory offenses—most of the latter were misdemeanors—and 78 were common-law and statutory offenses.

When I finished this inspection of the military prison, I went over to the United States penitentiary, located on the same reservation, and took a look at the inmates of that institution. They were men of more advanced years—most of them veteran criminals—all felons—and yet subjected to no more severe prison régime than were our young ex-soldiers at the military prison. I reached the conclusion that our system was fundamentally wrong. On returning to Washington at the conclusion of this investigation, I submitted my report, which I am going to ask the committee to publish as an appendix to my statement. Have I permission to do that?

WARREN. Is it very voluminous?

POWDER. No.

WARREN. It could go in at this place in the report, and not endix?

POWDER. I would like to have it go into the record at this

WARREN. Yes.

Report referred to is here printed in full in the record as

LETTER FROM THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL TO THE CHIEF OF STAFF,
NOVEMBER 17, 1911.

ADMINISTRATION OF THE MILITARY PRISON FROM A PENAL INSTITUTION TO A MILITARY REFORMATORY.

Not admit of question, I think, that the laws applicable to the military require it to be administered as a penal institution. As pointed out in my report, they follow closely the legislation of the States and the later legislation of States for the establishment and maintenance of penitentiaries. This is evident when the provisions embodying the requirements for employ-ees at daily hard labor and in the trades are considered. In some laws applicable to the prison are less humane than later legislation of States creating penitentiaries. For example, the provisions of the act of 1890 (26 Stat., 839), that in the construction of prison buildings there shall be no arrangement of cells and yard space that prisoners under 20 years of age in any way be associated with prisoners above that age, and that the management of the class under 20 years of age shall be, as far as possible, reformatory, is not the case in laws relating to the military prison.

Regulations adopted from time to time for the government of the military prison and its inmates (editions of 1877, 1883, 1888, 1890, and 1910) show that the Department has uniformly interpreted the law as requiring the prison to be administered as a penal institution. In the five editions of said prison regulations it is provided that prisoners should be clad in prison dress, wear their hair cut short, be clean shaven, be designated by numbers, and employed at hard labor at which convicts confined in civil prisons and penitentiaries are usually employed. While in the several editions of prison regulations in force up to 1895 the inmates of the prison were uniformly designated as "prisoners," in the present edition of the regulations the term "convict" is uniformly used.

The Department has uniformly administered the prison as a penal institution. It is not to appear from the present employment of prisoners confined therein, that it differs from past employment, except in so far as their labor is diverted to the construction of new prison construction, and which the commandant states as follows: Industrial labor.—This includes orderlies, messengers, clerks, barbers, cooks, hospital attendants; and tailors, shoemakers, harness makers, blacksmiths, electricians, tanners, carpenters, wheelwrights, carpet weavers, steam fitters, for repair purposes only; laundrymen, librarians, warehouse laborers, teamsters, printers; total, 250.

Construction work on new prison and the shops and industries in connection therewith; total, 450.

Outside work in connection with the construction of roads, the operation of a military railway, the care and preservation of the forest, the care of the reservation farm; total, 240. (This number is far below the daily requirements and does not meet the demand.)

The theory that the prison will continue to be administered as a penal institution after the completion of prison construction, the commandant recommends that it be employed as follows:

Industrial labor.—This includes orderlies, messengers, clerks, barbers, cooks, hospital attendants; and tailors, shoemakers, harness makers, blacksmiths, electricians, tanners, carpenters, wheelwrights, carpet weavers, steam fitters, for repair purposes only; laundrymen, librarians, warehouse laborers, teamsters, printers; total, 250.

Operation of shops inside the prison.—In the operation of the shops such work is recommended as would be least liable to cause interference from outside the prison. It follows: Making shoes for the use of all prisoners in the Army; making harness for the use of the Army; making brooms for the use of the Army (a large part of the broom can be raised on the prison farm); making tinware and stove pans, etc., for the use of the Army; also galvanized-iron buckets; making clothing for all prisoners in the Army, especially civilian suits for discharged prisoners; repair of wheel transportation; laundry work; total, 250. This number depends, of course, upon the amount of work of this class that is given the prison to do and can be expanded indefinitely.

"3. Outside work.—(a) The operation of the prison farm: Between 700 and 800 acres of land are now available for farm purposes; this will have to be diked and the diking will have to be of the very best; the river bottoms will have to be protected; it appears to be possible to do this and have an 800-acre farm in the bottoms; 200 additional acres could be secured on the reservation on the northwest side without interference with any military operations; a 1,000-acre farm, using a large part of it as a truck garden, would give employment to a large number of convicts. (b) The operation of a dairy for the use of the prison. (c) The repair and maintenance of post roads and the construction of reservation roads; approximately 12 miles of rock road are to be built. (d) Grading; the number of hills to be removed and the amount of yardage is very great. (e) Drainage and construction of culverts and bridges; this work requires a large amount of labor. (f) Care of the forest and the conversion of waste portions of the forest into park land for use of troops in maneuvers. (g) Crematory and disposal of wastes; should the crematory be removed from its present location, which appears to be inevitable, the construction and maintenance of it should be turned over to the prison. (h) Operation and repair of the terminal railway system; the handling of all freight, coal, and forage in connection with the operation of the railway system. (i) Operation of the rock quarries, crushers, limekiln, brick plant, concrete-block machines in connection with such work at the prison and post as may be authorized by the Quartermaster General. (j) Installation of a water supply for the prison and post. (k) Operation of an electric-light and power plant for the prison and post. (l) Operation of an ice and refrigerating plant for the prison and the post."

Because of the proximity of the military prison to the large and important post of Fort Leavenworth, and the extensive and urgent demands for labor upon the post reservation indicated above, it is probably true that no similar institution of the United States or of any State or Territory is in such a favorable situation for the utilization for public purposes of free prison labor. The extensive employment of its inmates at daily hard labor on the much needed and urgent improvements of the military reservation proper, the conservation of the forests, and the building of roads, for which contract labor would otherwise be necessarily employed, would result in very obvious economies to the Government; while the employment of the prisoners on the large prison farm (about 900 acres) in the raising of food products, in the shops of the prison at trades in the manufacture of articles for use of prison and prisoners confined there and at posts, would be a long step in the direction of making the prison self-sustaining. The argument of economy is thus seen to be exceptionally strong, and, in connection with the opportunity the work outlined above affords for the training of prisoners in civil employment and graduating them back into civil pursuits under conditions which would put them in the way of establishing themselves in civil life upon their release from the military prison, constitutes the most persuasive argument that can be urged, I think, in favor of continuing the administration of the military prison as a penal institution.

I am prepared to concede to this argument controlling effect as to the inmates of the prison convicted of common-law and statutory felonies alone. These belong to the regular criminal class, and their punishment should conform to what is prescribed by law for this class of prisoners undergoing punishment in our United States, State, and Territorial prisons; but I do not think it should be regarded as decisive of the more important question presented, viz: Should soldiers, convicted of purely military offenses, committed in time of peace, be subject to ignominious penal servitude similar to that inflicted upon common-law and statutory felons? Preliminary to a discussion of this question, I invite attention to the following classification of prisoners serving sentence at the military prison, Fort Leavenworth, at the time of my inspection:

Of desertion only.....	440
Of desertion and fraudulent enlistment only.....	104
Of desertion and other military crimes other than fraudulent enlistment.....	56
Of desertion, fraudulent enlistment, and other military crimes.....	12

The data for the Pacific branch of the United States military prison at Alcatraz Island, Calif., if assembled, would probably show similar percentage strength of the several classes of prisoners confined in said branch.

The foregoing classification is not as complete as it is desirable that it should be, in that it fails to distinguish between civil felonies and misdemeanors. It is doubtless true that a large majority of the prisoners listed as common-law and statutory offenders have been convicted of misdemeanors only, and that therefore only a very small percentage of the inmates of the military prison belong to the regular criminal class.

It will be noted that the average age at enlistment of prisoners serving sentences for desertion is about 23 years. I did not ascertain the average age at enlistment of other classes of offenders, but it is presumably about the same as for deserters. The average age of prisoners at the time of my inspection may be safely estimated at between 25 and 26 years. The contrast in respect of age between them and convicts of the United States penitentiary located on the same military reservation, which I visited, is most marked, the latter being in appearance a much older class of men. In prison dress and in the methods of treatment and daily employment of inmates there is no substantial difference between the two institutions, and the inmates of the prison are undergoing penal servitude of the same character as inmates of the penitentiary, with the additional ignominy in case of deserters of loss of citizenship rights, of rights to become citizens, and the right to hold office of trust or profit under the United States.

Recurring now to Tables 1, 2, and 3, we find that of the 940 prisoners undergoing sentence at the military prison at the time of my inspection, 667—approximately 71 per cent—were convicted of purely military offenses. If we add to these those convicted of purely military offenses in connection with common-law and statutory offenses of the grade of misdemeanor, ordinarily punished by light jail sentences, we shall have a total of approximately 90 per cent of the inmates of the prison, by far the greater number deserters, who may be said not to belong to the regular criminal class, but who are undergoing the same kind of penal servitude as felons confined in the United States penitentiary located on the same reservation. The question whether penal servitude is a proper punishment for them is thus seen to turn mainly on what is a proper punishment for desertion in time of peace.

Perhaps there is no other single subject connected with the administration of the Military Establishment which has received more earnest attention by the military authorities than this subject of desertion, its causes, and its proper punishment. Annual reports, service journals, and the public press have teemed with its discussion. It may be said also that there is no other single subject connected with Army administration in respect of which such diverse views have been expressed. Systematic efforts have been made to ameliorate the condition of the soldier in respect of his living, dress, enjoyments, comfort, and contentment as a means of reducing desertion rates. The Inspector General, in his report of 1905, summarizes the efforts of the Government in this regard as follows:

"It has constructed for him barracks luxurious in their appointments compared to the housing of the armies of other civilized countries throughout the world; it has provided in these barracks air space in dimension equal to the demands dictated by the best scientific thought; it has given him spring beds, mattresses, pillows, sheets, and pillow cases; it has provided him with toilets and baths of the most modern manufacture, and much superior in general appearance and effect to similar necessities enjoyed by people in middle life; it has provided spacious reading rooms, supplied with newspapers and books calculated to cater to the soldier's taste; it has bettered the amount and quality of his clothing; it is to-day supplying him with the largest variety and best quality of food that is given to any Army, and at many of the large posts it has provided magnificent exchange buildings, not a few of which have swimming tanks and gymnasiums thoroughly equipped for athletic exercises. It has made the demands of discipline and authority over the soldier, in conformity with the spirit of the age, mild compared to what it was 20 years ago; it sends the uneducated soldier to school and gives the partially educated every advantage of an extended education; it has provided outdoor amusements for him in the way of athletic games; and it has, in fact, accomplished everything to make him contented and to cause him to live out his enlistment, with one exception—it has failed to provide an adequate punishment for the crime of desertion.

"Nine-tenths of the soldiers who desert from the Army of the United States have no real cause for the act."

But the efforts of the Government have not been limited to what is outlined in the foregoing report of the Inspector General. We have tried the additional expedients of long-term and short term enlistments, bounty for reenlistment, retained pay and detained pay, forfeited to the Government by desertion, discharge by purchase and, finally, increased pay—all, except discharge by purchase, without appreciable deterrent effect upon the commission of the offense of desertion. If, as claimed by the Inspector General, we have failed to find adequate punishment for desertion, it is not because we have not run the gamut in this regard; for we tried the ignominious punishment of branding and tattooing the deserter, the wearing of ball and chain, and long sentences of penal servitude. We have also tried the expedient of recognizing different grades of criminality in desertion, distinguishing between the recruit led off by companions, homesickness, ignorance, and the old soldier who commits the offense with full knowledge and deliberation, giving to the former a very short term of imprisonment and frequent restoration to duty, and preserving as to the latter the long sentence of penal servitude. In 1908 we abandoned the attempt to distinguish between the recruit and the old soldier in respect of this offense and provided one punishment for desertion, only to return to the prior system in 1911. That none of the expedients has been attended with results which were satisfactory to the department tends directly to support the view expressed by The Adjutant General of the Army in his report for the fiscal year of 1908, that:

"The principal cause of the evils in question lies deeper than any of the causes commonly assigned for them, and is beyond the reach of any of the measures proposed. Our people, although aggressive enough, are not a military people. They have little real interest in the Army in time of peace, and from the earliest days of the Republic have been accustomed to look upon it as a more or less unnecessary institution that may be pared down with safety whenever a demand for retrenchment of public expenses arises. Enlistment in the Army in time of peace is not uncommonly regarded as evidence of worthlessness on the part of the recruit, and desertion in such a time is generally looked upon as nothing more culpable than the breach of a civil contract for service. The deserter suffers little or no loss of caste by reason of his offense, and is seldom without friends and sympathizers to shield him from arrest and to intercede in his behalf in the comparatively rare event of his falling into the hands of the military authorities.

"It is safe to predict that desertion from the Army will continue to be excessive until there shall have been a radical change of public sentiment toward the Army and until the deserter shall come to be regarded as the criminal that he is, to be ostracized and hunted down as relentlessly as any other transgressor of the laws. There is no reason to look for such a change of sentiment in the near future, and there are some who believe that the change will never come until our people shall have learned through national disaster and humiliation, that the effective maintenance of an Army of professional soldiers is absolutely essential to the preservation of the national honor and life, and that the trained and disciplined troops of a modern enemy can not be withstood by hastily organized armies of untrained or half-trained civilians."

I concur in the view here forcefully expressed that the main obstacle encountered by the military authorities in their efforts to reduce desertion is found in the attitude of the people toward this offense. Public opinion, with which we have to reckon in the enforcement of any law or policy, does not associate and never has associated moral turpitude with desertion in time of peace. For this reason we do not have and never have had the cooperation and aid of public sentiment in the execution of our policy of treating desertion as a felony and punishing the deserter as a felon. I concur further in the view intimated above that this state of feeling is an outgrowth of our military policy to rely upon a volunteer army rather than upon an army of professional soldiers, and that the sentiment will continue so long as that policy continues; that is, for the indefinite future. It must, I think, be taken into account in determining our policy in dealing with the offense.

But in the past three years marked success has been achieved in reducing desertion rates in face of this adverse public sentiment by the vigorous campaign for the apprehension and punishment of deserters inaugurated by The Adjutant General's Office. The system of apprehension is fully explained in the annual reports of The Adjutant General for the fiscal years 1909 and 1910. It involves telegraphic notice to The Adjutant General's Office of every desertion, the preparation and distribution of desertion circulars, containing personal descriptions and reproductions of photographs of deserters, with an announcement of rewards payable for their apprehension and delivery. It appears that about 4,000 copies of such desertion circulars are distributed to department, post, troop, battery, company, or detachment commanders, to United States marshals, police officers of the larger cities, to established detective agencies, to agents of the Secret Service Division of the Treasury Department and of the Bureau of Investigation of the Department of Justice, and to civil peace officers in the vicinity of the homes of the deserters and in localities to which they are likely to go.

The system outlined above became fully inaugurated in October of 1908. It found the desertion rate of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908, at 4.59 per cent. Its deterrent effect was not immediately apparent, for in the fiscal year of 1909 there was a slight increase in the desertion rate. This is explained in the report of The Adjutant General for that year by the fact that the enlisted strength of the Army was largely increased during the year, with the result that an unusually large proportion of the enlisted men were serving in the earlier part of their enlistment, when desertions are most frequent. In the fiscal year of 1910, when normal conditions in this regard were more nearly approached, the desertion rate fell to 3.66. In the fiscal year of 1911 it fell to 2.28 per cent, the lowest desertion rate that has been reached since the establishment of the military prison in 1874, except for the fiscal year of 1898, when because of the very large increase in enlistments incident to the war the percentage rate decreased to 1.57.

I think service opinion will be found to support the view that this very marked reduction in desertion rates is to be attributed almost entirely to the system of apprehension and punishment of deserters outlined above and would view with marked disfavor any modification of the system which would tend to imperil the excellent results that follow its employment. The point to which I would invite special attention is the necessity, if any, for retaining the degrading punishment of ignominious penal servitude, or, stated in other words, whether the change in the character of the punishment, retaining its severity in so far as is consistent with the change, would impair the excellent results to be obtained under the system as now enforced.

That the stigma of prison confinement operates as a deterrent to desertion must be conceded, just as we must concede deterrent effect to the old but now disused punishments of branding and tattooing of deserters, but to what extent prison confinement has operated to deter desertion is not readily deducible from desertion statistics. It sufficiently appears, however, that during the entire period we enforced penal servitude as a punishment for desertion the department was confronted with the unsatisfactory results already referred to, and that results did not become measurably satisfactory until the vigorous campaign looking to the apprehension of deserters was fully inaugurated. A comparison of desertion statistics of the period from 1875 to 1895, during which the military prison was available for confinement of soldiers convicted of purely military offenses, with the period from 1896 to 1906, during which it was not so available, shows that the percentage of desertion to total enlisted strength during the former period was approximately 6.77 per cent, and during the latter period 4.68 per cent, excluding the year 1898, during which the percentage was, for abnormal causes, unusually low. There is thus seen to have been an actual falling off in the rate of desertion during the period that penal servitude was not in force, a reduction which must be attributed, however, largely to the fact that discharge by purchase was operative during the entire period from 1896 to 1906, whereas during the former period of 21 years it was operative only for 5 years. Still, the fact that the effect of discharge by purchase in reducing desertion was not in a greater degree neutralized by the abatement in the character of the punishment would seem to furnish some suggestion that the stigma of penal servitude, standing alone, has not a relatively important deterrent influence upon desertion.

The question has, however, another aspect which I think merits consideration. I find that since the restoration of the prison to military control in 1906, 3,924 prisoners have been confined therein. The number confined in the prison from its establishment in 1874 down to its transfer to the Department of Justice in 1895 I have been unable to ascertain, but it is undoubtedly very large; nor have I available the number of men who have been confined in the branch prison at Alcatraz during the period of its existence. Taking a total of these we have a very large number of persons who have passed from these prisons into civil life. In common with other soldiers dishonorably discharged and held in confinement at posts, they remain after discharge from confinement under statutory disability for future military service, those convicted of desertion having the additional disabilities of loss of citizenship rights, of rights to become a citizen, or to hold any office of profit or trust under the Government. They constitute a large and ever-increasing element of our population properly described as military outcasts.

That the organic act establishing the military prison (act of Mar. 3, 1873) contemplated that this element should to some extent be saved to the Army is made plain by the provision of section 6 of that act, that:

"The Secretary of War is authorized and directed to remit, in part, the sentences of such convicts and to give them an honorable restoration to duty in case the same is merited."

I can not ascertain that the Secretary of War has ever made any use of the authority here given him to restore prisoners to duty. It has not been possible for him to do so since the enactment of the act of August 1, 1894, prohibiting the reenlistment of men whose last preceding term of enlistment has not been honest and faithful. In order that the inmates of the prison may have restored to them the chance for honorable restoration to duty with the colors which the Congress granted them in the original enactment, it will be necessary to seek such amendment of the act of August 1, 1894, as will except from its prohibition inmates of the military prison confined therein for purely military offenses and discharged therefrom as good-conduct prisoners. Administered upon these lines the prison would acquire the character of a reformatory, or detention barracks such as are now maintained by England for the confinement of purely military offenders, and which are described by an officer of our Army who has recently inspected them, as follows:

"Only such soldiers as have been convicted of military offenses as distinguished from statutory or common-law offenses are sent to detention barracks for punishment and correction. The controlling idea in the treatment of the soldier, when confined in the barracks, is to reform him and send him away from the institution a better instructed soldier than when he entered. He is worked 10½ hours a day. No prison garb is worn. The soldier is in uniform at all times, except possibly when in the workshops, and then he wears working clothes. They are designated by name--no numbers are used. Although the inmates are kept under close surveillance during the day, and in barred cells under lock and key at night, yet every effort consistent with this is made, and with considerable success, to eliminate the prison atmosphere and aspect of the surroundings. Hard work, wholesome food, plenty of sleep, regular hours, kindly treatment, and total abstinence from the use of all intoxicants and tobacco soon bring the man under control of his own will. This is the condition the authorities attempt to develop as a preliminary to proper reformation of character. Much of the work is purely military and especially designed to perfect the man in marksmanship and the use of his weapons. There is daily instruction for some hours in this class of work. The barrack inclosure is fitted up with almost every known device for training in shooting, and I was told that remarkable results are secured. Instruction is also given in military bridge building and in other types of purely military work, including a very thorough course in gymnastics.

"Each man is required to do a certain amount of work daily in the workshope. All of this work has a direct bearing on the military service and includes such tasks as repairing picks, shovels, barrack chairs, mattresses, beds, etc., which are sent to the institution from the garrisons on the outside. Very few of the inmates possessed any of the ordinary characteristics of the criminal class in appearance or bearing, and as a matter of fact they do not belong to this class. Had I seen the same men doing the same work in other surroundings I would have noted no special difference between them and other soldiers. They appeared to work with spirit and willingness, and a good atmosphere pervaded the place. The treatment by those over them, while severe and unrelenting, is very kindly. * * * The director of the institution said that he seldom or never had the same man committed a second time.

"It is worthy of note that all cases of desertion are handled here.

"The controlling idea is to send the man out sound in mind and body, reformed, and as well instructed in his duties as a soldier as he would have been had he remained in his organization."

The attitude of the English people toward desertion is the same as that of our own people. There, as here, public opinion does not associate moral turpitude with this offense. The reason is not far to seek. The contract of enlistment is voluntarily entered into and the abandonment of the service is considered by the people simply a breach of the voluntary contract. In the British service the fact has been recognized and the policy of punishing deserters as felons has been abandoned. We persist in the policy in the hope, which I think can never be realized, that by so persisting we can educate our 90,000,000 people to take the service view that the deserter should be punished as a felon.

From what has been said above it is evident that if we should adopt, in principle, the system of detention barracks as administered in the British service, there need result no abatement in severity of punishment now obtaining in our service, except in so far as relieving prisoners from the ignominy of penal servitude would be an abatement. This could be compensated for to some degree by increasing the punishment for military offenses. Daily hard labor to the extent necessary for the domestic administration of the prison would continue as heretofore, but the system would require that there should be relief from daily hard labor not connected with said domestic administration and the time thus saved given over to the most rigid military instruction; and it would seem reasonable that, under such instructions, inmates would acquire proficiency in rifle practice and other specialized military training equal if not superior to that acquired by men who remain with the colors, and that such opposition as may now exist among officers and enlisted men to receiving inmates of the prison back into their organizations would in a very large measure disappear as to those good-conduct prisoners who acquire such proficiency and are discharged with the recommendation that they be permitted to reenlist.

The details of the new system would, I think, be appropriately fixed by a board convened especially for the purpose. I think it would be an essential part of the new system that prisoners undergoing confinement at the military prison or its branch for grave common-law and statutory crimes, and those convicted of such crimes in connection with military offenses, should be segregated.

I would suggest that Alcatraz Prison and Fort Jay Prison be reserved for their confinement, and their administration as prisons continued. And I would further suggest that those convicted of purely military offenses would be properly confined in the detention barracks, to be subjected to special discipline, the general outlines of which are given above, with a view to their restoration to duty with the colors. There would remain those convicted of common-law and statutory misdemeanors of a character ordinarily punished with light jail sentences, or of such misdemeanors in connection with purely military offenses. These, under the policy above outlined, should be sent, I think, to the detention barracks, there to be kept employed at daily hard labor connected with its domestic administration, to be admitted to the classes undergoing special military instruction only as their conduct may justify it. The effect would be such a division of military prisoners under sentence by court-martial as would segregate and give over to special training all those who have offended primarily against the discipline of the Army, leaving the regular criminal classes under the prison régime to which they are at present subjected.

In view of the fact that we are legislatively committed to the maximum use of the labor of military prisoners on new prison construction, the change from prison to detention barracks must await the completion of said construction—about two years—unless it can be assumed that Congress will be found willing to complete said construction by contract labor. But when the new prison is completed the way will be open to inaugurate the change, which can be administratively accomplished, except in the following regards, where it would be advisable to have amendments of the existing law so as to provide:

1. For changing the name "United States military prison" to "United States detention barracks," and for making the designation of the inmates of the detention barracks uniform by eliminating the term "convict" wherever necessary and substituting therefor the term "prisoner," which latter term is used in the existing law as synonymous with the term convict.

2. For exempting the detention barracks from the existing provision vesting the government and control of the prison in the Board of Commissioners of the United States Soldiers' Home; this for the reason that the detention barracks would become an integral part of the military establishment, to be administered directly as any other department thereof.

3. For modifying the provision of existing law respecting the employment of prisoners in said detention barracks so as to limit the daily hard labor of prisoners confined therein to what is required for purposes of domestic administration, as outlined above by the prison commandant, and directing that prisoners not so employed shall be subjected to a rigid course of military training and instruction.

4. For exempting from the prohibitions of section 1118 of the Revised Statutes against the enlistment in the military service of any deserter therefrom and of section 2 of the act of August 1, 1894 (28 Stat., 216), against the reenlistment in the military service of any soldier whose service during his last preceding term of enlistment has not been honest and faithful, all good-conduct prisoners discharged from the detention barracks or post guardhouse with the recommendation of the authorities of the detention barracks or post that they be permitted to reenlist.

5. For the modification of the requirements of sections 1996 and 1998, Revised Statutes, so as to provide that the forfeiture of citizenship rights or of the right to become citizens shall not attach to a conviction of desertion committed in times of peace.

Other minor changes will be required in the existing law, and of course, extensive amendments of the existing regulations governing the United States military prison at Fort Leavenworth would be necessary to conform them to the amended law.

The last recommendation (No. 5) was designed to remove the forfeiture of citizenship rights, or of the right to become citizens, which those statutes imposed in case of desertion committed in time of peace, leaving that penalty in force for desertion committed in time of war; and I will interpolate here that these statutes had their origin in the Civil War Act of March 3, 1865, and represented the then thought of Congress on the subject. This act was a sweeping, drastic provision which required that this penalty of forfeiture of citizenship rights and of the right to become citizens should attach automatically to a conviction of desertion and made no distinction between peace and war.

We lived under that statute up until a subsequent date, which I shall refer to in the further remarks that I have to make to the committee.

Projects of legislation to carry out both (4) and (5) were submitted to the War Department and transmitted to Congress and a project of an act repealing the prison statute and substituting therefor the disciplinary barracks statute, which ultimately became the act of March 4, 1915, was submitted by me to Congress on May 27, 1912. That project provided for both restoration and reenlistment of good-conduct prisoners.

Segregation.—At my inspection in 1911 I found purely military offenders held in close association with common-law and statutory felons. I recommended in my report the segregation of these military offenders, and on December 29, 1911, this recommendation was carried into effect by the issue of orders prepared by me directing that all felons held at Leavenworth, with the exception of a few with short periods of confinement remaining to be served, be transferred to Alcatraz; and all prisoners at Alcatraz convicted of purely military offenses, with like exception, be transferred to Leavenworth; giving to Leavenworth prison the character of a disciplinary barracks or reformatory, but continuing Alcatraz as a penal institution. The same order changed the designation of the inmates at Leavenworth from military convicts to general prisoners.

In other words, I was trying to proceed in advance of an act of Congress, and as far as I could go without the authorization of Congress, to establish this reform immediately.

Nothing further was accomplished in the way of prison reform in the year of 1911. My report was submitted in November, 1911, and segregation was an accomplished fact before December 31 of the same year.

What was done was preparatory to the inauguration of greater reforms when the necessary legislation could be secured from Congress.

I appeared before the Military Committee of the House in May of 1912 in support of the then pending revision of the Articles of War. Section 2 of that revision contained the reform of the prison statutes. The salient provisions of the bill were:

- (1) Changing the designation from prison to barracks.
- (2) Segregating military offenders from felons.
- (3) Placing the control of the barracks directly under the control of the Secretary of War. You will remember, Senator Warren, that the military prison was then under the control of the board of governors of the Regular Army Soldiers' Home, located in the District of Columbia.

SENATOR WARREN. Yes; I remember that.

GEN. CROWDER. The next provision was:

- (4) Authorizing prisoners confined in the barracks to be placed under military training with a view to honorable restoration to duty or reenlistment; and
- (5) Authorizing the Secretary of War to restore to duty prisoners confined in said barracks.

This section 2, along with the revision of the Articles of War, failed of a favorable report by the House committee. However, on August 22, 1912 (37 Stat., 356), Congress enacted the law recommended in my report of 1911 exempting peace-time deserters from loss of citizenship rights and permitting the reenlistment of peace-time deserters and other classes of prisoners whose prior service had not been honest and faithful, when specially authorized by the Secretary of War. We immediately entered upon the policy of reenlistment of prisoners confined in the military prison.

Gen. Ansell did not report for duty in the Office of the Judge Advocate General until March 11, 1912, after all the legislation on the subject which was afterwards enacted into law had been formulated. I do not think he has claimed or would claim that the scheme was in any sense his own, or that he had any substantial part in formulating the several projects.

Reenlistment.—As I have said, immediately following the enactment of August 22, 1912, we commenced the policy of recommending deserving general prisoners confined in the military prison for reenlistment, and in the annual report of the prison commandant for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, is found the statement that 63 general prisoners had been recommended for reenlistment under that act.

In August of 1913 I made a second inspection of the military prisons, and in my report of that inspection recommended that we proceed in advance of any authorization by Congress to inaugurate that part of the scheme of reform which looked to military training of deserving general prisoners. On September 17 of 1913 there was issued from the War Department, upon my recommendation, General Order No. 56, War Department, 1913, which I will insert here:

GENERAL ORDERS, }
No. 56. }

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, September 17, 1913.

1. General prisoners confined at the United States Military Prison at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., under sentence for purely military offenses alone, whose record and conduct are such as to entitle them to the privilege, will be afforded an opportunity to receive a special course in military training during a portion of the time that would otherwise be devoted to hard labor. To that end, the formation of one or more, but until further orders not exceeding four, disciplinary companies at said prison is hereby authorized and directed.

2. Except in particular cases in which the commandant of the prison deems such enrollment unwise, all general prisoners of the first class (paragraph 30, Regulations, United States Military Prison, 1909), confined at the United States Military Prison at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., under sentences for purely military offenses alone, will be enrolled in disciplinary companies, but no such general prisoner shall in any case be excluded from enrollment in a disciplinary company, or from regular participation in the course in military instruction, because his services may be regarded as desirable or necessary elsewhere.

3. Disciplinary companies will be organized as Infantry, and four such companies will constitute a disciplinary battalion.

DETAILS OF ORGANIZATION.

Disciplinary Company—

Officers.—One captain or first lieutenant detailed as company commander, and 1 lieutenant detailed for duty with the company.

Enlisted men.—One sergeant detailed as acting first sergeant, 1 sergeant detailed as acting quartermaster sergeant, 4 sergeants, and 8 corporals.

General prisoners.—Two under instruction as musicians and 56 under instruction as privates.

The number of general prisoners placed under instruction as privates in a disciplinary company may be increased to 84, in which case the number of enlisted men assigned to duty with the company will be increased by 2 corporals and 2 lance corporals.

Disciplinary Battalion—

One major or captain detailed as battalion commander.

One first lieutenant detailed as battalion adjutant.

One sergeant detailed as acting battalion sergeant major.

Four disciplinary companies.

4. The officers required for duty with disciplinary organizations will be detailed in orders from the War Department, and the enlisted men required for duty as noncommissioned officers of such organizations will be assigned thereto by the commandant of the prison from enlisted men assigned to duty at the prison for that purpose.

5. General prisoners enrolled in disciplinary organizations will be placed under military training and instruction during one half of each working day, but will be required to work during the other half. Exceptions to this requirement may be made by the commandant in cases of individual skilled workmen and paroled prisoners.

cessary in the work of reconstruction and in the operation of the railway like employment, but this discretion will not be exercised in such a way these men of a fair amount of military training and instruction.

Under instruction as members of a disciplinary organization, and during sure, general prisoners will be dressed in such uniform, without facings as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War. For this purpose obsolete arms will be utilized. When at work, general prisoners enrolled in disciplinary organizations will be dressed in fatigue clothing.

Disciplinary organizations will be armed and equipped as Infantry, with such arms and equipment as may be recommended by the commandant of the organization approved by superior authority. The firing pins of rifles placed in the hands of general prisoners enrolled in disciplinary organizations will be removed, and replaced temporarily while the prisoner is engaged in gallery practice or other supervised labor under the supervision within the prison inclosure.

General prisoners enrolled in disciplinary companies will be designated by name and number; will not be required to work in the same party with general prisoners not enrolled in disciplinary companies; will be quartered in a separate building in the prison; will be seated at separate tables in the dining room and in the chapel; will be permitted the privilege of rendering the preliminary salute; and when under arms, at work or at meals, will be permitted to march with each other under the restrictions that govern enlisted men while in the service.

The course of military training and instruction for general prisoners enrolled in disciplinary organizations will include: physical training; personal hygiene, including the use of the uniform; the school of the soldier, squad, company, and battalion; Cavalry and Field Artillery drill; elementary signaling; care of arms and equipment; marching and sighting drill; gallery practice, rifle and revolver; sabre drill; bayonet practice; pitching and striking tents; hasty shelter—use of intrenching tools and lashings; duties of enlisted men in military bridge construction; and the duties of enlisted men in the service of security and information—advance, rear and flank guards, and scouting.

Under the foregoing regulations one disciplinary company will be organized at Castle William, Fort Jay, N. Y.

General prisoners confined at Castle William, Fort Jay, N. Y., under sentence for common-law crimes or misdemeanors alone or in connection with military offenses, are not eligible for membership in the disciplinary company organized at that place. They will be kept separate from purely military offenders. Prison facilities permit, with further segregation of felons from misdemeanors, the harder labor will be devolved upon felons.

At the Pacific Branch of the United States Military Prison, Alcatraz, Calif., confined only those general prisoners who have been convicted of statutory common-law crimes or misdemeanors alone or in connection with purely military offenses. Application of these regulations will be deferred until it is determined whether the system should be extended to misdemeanants undergoing confinement at this branch prison. Felons and misdemeanants will be segregated so far as practicable, and detachments to Angel Island and other places in the harbor by posts for hard labor in construction, improvement, and other public works, as far as practicable, be drawn from the felon class.

The method of dealing with prisoners here outlined is an innovation. The method is to a certain extent tentative and experimental, and will be limited in its operation circumscribed in the future as experience may suggest. The commandant of the United States Military Prison at Fort Leavenworth, of its Pacific branch, and the prison officer, Castle William, Fort Jay, will report by letter to the Judge Advocate General of the Army, who will have the control, under the Secretary of War, of these prisons and their administration. Direct correspondence with chiefs of staff corps and departments, as now maintained, will continue.

The policy of the War Department to separate, so far as practicable, general prisoners convicted of offenses punishable by penitentiary confinement from general prisoners convicted of purely military offenses or of misdemeanors in connection with military offenses. In furtherance of this policy reviewing authorities will determine whether the penitentiary is the proper place of confinement of general prisoners sentenced for more than one year upon conviction of offenses punishable by confinement in a penitentiary under some statute of the United States or under some other law in force in the locality in which the offense was committed (see Article 1 of the Geneva Convention of 1864), except in individual cases in which the proved circumstances justify the holding of the prisoners so convicted in prison associations with misde-meanants and military offenders will not be to the detriment of the latter. For general prisoners to be confined in penitentiaries under the foregoing rule, reviewing authorities in the United States or Hawaii will designate the United States Penitentiary at Leavenworth, Kans., as the place of confinement, except that such prisoners as are residents of Hawaii, Porto Rico, and the Canal Zone may be confined in local penitentiaries; and reviewing authorities in the Philippine Islands will designate the penitentiary at Bilibid, Manila, P. I., as the place of confinement.

[2079146, A. G. O.]

By order of the Secretary of War:

LEONARD WOOD,
Major General, Chief of Staff.

Official:

GEO. ANDREWS,
The Adjutant General.

You will observe that this order authorized and directed the organization of a maximum of four disciplinary companies at Leavenworth prison to be composed of general prisoners serving sentences for purely military offenses, and further authorized one disciplinary company at Castle William, Fort Jay. It directed that members of the disciplinary organization were to be taken out of prison garb and put into uniform. They were to be known by name and not by number, separated from other prisoners, permitted to render and receive the military salute, and to be armed, equipped, and trained as infantry—all for the purpose of developing their own self-respect and fitting them for restoration to duty. Disciplinary companies were organized rather promptly in the remaining months of 1913 and January, 1914.

It was not until February 6, 1914, that the pending bill to convert the United States Military Prison into a disciplinary barracks was favorably reported by Senator Chamberlain with some amendments made by the Senate Military Affairs Committee of which he was then the chairman. The bill failed to pass at that session of Congress. But we got partial relief in the act of April 27, 1914 (37 Stat. 346, 352), in the form of a rider on the annual Army appropriation bill, inserted on my insistent recommendation, authorizing a suspension of the sentence of dishonorable discharge when there was reasonable hope of reclaiming the man. As to all men thereafter convicted and sentenced, with a suspended dishonorable discharge, we could proceed to restore the men by remitting the dishonorable discharge, of which the execution had been suspended, and in this way send them back to their organizations. This was followed by instructions to commanding generals, issued on June 9, to suspend sentences of dishonorable discharge whenever there was a probability of reclaiming the soldier to honorable service (G. O. 45, June 9, 1914). In this order it was announced that "the object in seeking the legislation authorizing the suspension of dishonorable discharge was to afford a plan of giving soldiers convicted of purely military offenses an opportunity to reclaim themselves and gain restoration to the colors."

But there remained, of course, the large class already in confinement whose sentences of dishonorable discharge had already been executed and who did not come within the provisions of the foregoing act of April 27, 1914, and General Order No. 45. They could only, under the accepted construction of the statute, get back into the service under the legislation of August 22, 1912, heretofore noted—that is, by reenlistment for a full term. Not being willing to wait further for the enactment of the pending bill, which would have them, I directed a study of section 1353, Revised Statutes' section 6 of the original prison act, to see if there could not be derived therefrom this power of restoration as to inmates of the prison whose discharges had already been executed. Gen. Ansell entered into that study. With his usual ability, he analyzed the matter and presented a strong brief contending for the construction that it was sufficient to reach this class of prisoners. Secretary Clegg, then in office, gave the opinion his careful consideration and finally approved it March 7, 1914, though, I think, not without reservation as to its legal correctness, but in the belief that Congress would ultimately validate this procedure by giving it the necessary sanction. From that time on we had recourse to both courses, to reenlistment for the full term, and to restoration to the prison, in dealing with the inmates of this prison.

One remark here that I have found in Gen. Ansell's testimony is to the effect that there was great opposition in the War Department to this instruction. All that I can say is that with my very keen interest in it, I never heard of great opposition. I know that Secretary Clegg gave the legal question considerable study, and that he reserved his approval for about two weeks before he gave his approval of the instruction. But that there was such opposition on the part of the War Department from which you could deduce a military autocratic character on the part of the officers of the War Department at that time, I am not invited to do, I doubt very much. Certainly, I did not WARREN. Were there any unfavorable comments from officers, outside of the department?

POWDER. His statement was that within the department there was opposition.

WARREN. Do you know of any supposed opposition from officers, from officers in command?

POWDER. No; though I think a great majority of officers were opposed to the reform with apprehension. They believed in punishment and its deterrent effect.

One of the contributions that Gen. Ansell made to the scheme of reform was his opinion on section 1353, Revised Statutes. When he had entered upon his study, 63 inmates of the prison had been recommended for reenlistment in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, nearly twice that number before the date of the rendition of his opinion in 1914. The first man restored under his opinion was on March 14, 1914. The record for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, at the Leavenworth Prison shows that 40 per cent of the men released from the prison in that year were recommended for reenlistment. Many preferred that course to restoration. From March 14, 1914, to June 30, 1914, 39 men had been restored.

Under the enactment of the bill repealing the prison act and substituting the disciplinary act the reforms carried out by Executive Order and by acts of Congress may be summarized as follows:

Classification and segregation of prisoners, December, 1911.
Enlistment of inmates as authorized by act of August 22,

Organization of disciplinary battalions and companies and institution of military training for purely military offenders, September, 1913.

(4) Instruction to department commanders to suspend sentences of dishonorable discharge inaugurated under act of April 27, 1914.

(5) Disciplinary battalion established on October 13, 1914, at branch military prison at Alcatraz, extending to misdemeanants confined there the privileges of military training and instruction.

So it was that the system of reform was already pretty well established in its more essential features before Congress finally came to enact the bill for the repeal of the prison statute, which it did on March 4, 1915, as a rider on the Army appropriation act. But the act of that date did abolish the penal character of the institution, change the name, and convert the institution in a very real sense into a military reform school, where every inmate could earn, by good conduct, irrespective of the length of his sentence, an honorable restoration to duty with the colors, and an honorable discharge.

Senator WARREN. At that point: Do you propose to comment upon the old law and the new law, at some place in your remarks?

Gen. CROWDER. Yes.

Senator WARREN. I wish you would do so.

Gen. CROWDER. There remained little to be done under the act of March 4, 1915. We reorganized the disciplinary battalion and companies (G. O. 21, April 13, 1915, drafted by me) and on May 18, 1915, issued parole regulations in aid of the execution of so much of the act of March 4, 1915, as authorized the Secretary of War to establish a system of parole for inmates of disciplinary barracks. This parole provision was a separate rider and not a part of the prison section proper.

I realized that this scheme was not complete unless we had some corresponding measure of relief for those who could not be recommended for either reenlistment or restoration, and I sought this parole rider as a separate rider to this bill. It gave authority to the Secretary of War to establish a system of parole for military prisoners; and the regulations were issued under it, providing for the release of men back into civil life who had served at least half of their sentences.

Senator WARREN. That was a companion piece to what had preceded?

Gen. CROWDER. A companion piece, so as to cover the entire population of the prison.

Senator WARREN. Yes.

Gen. CROWDER. Under this system as thus built up and as it exists to-day, the disciplinary barracks at Leavenworth and the two branches at Alcatraz and Governors Island are sharply to be distinguished from the ordinary prison, and confinement therein is sharply to be distinguished from penal servitude. They are the reform schools of the Army, the primary purpose of which is to fit inmates for honorable restoration to duty with the colors or for useful employments in civil life.

Senator WARREN. Is Alcatraz used also for the Navy and the Marine Corps?

Gen. CROWDER. No, sir.

Senator WARREN. Just for the Army?

Gen. CROWDER. It is exclusively an Army barracks now. The essentials of the system of military penology are:

indeterminate sentence (effected by means of a suspended or dishonorable discharge, remission of the unexecuted sentence to confinement, and restoration to duty or to reenlist); eng men for restoration by training them and stimulating respect through—military training and instruction in the disciplinary battalion. Taking them out of prison garb, putting them into uniform; calling them "convicts;" giving them the privilege of the military; treating them as soldiers under intensive military industrial as well as military training; all tending to stimulate the man's self-respect and sense of his own value, and giving him the opportunity for greater usefulness in his organization, and to earn money upon return to civil life, and become a better citizen.

WARREN. As I understand you, that took the place of hard LABROWDER. Of all of what is described by the phrase, "penal LABROWDER. In that connection, will you tell us how they

LABROWDER. I can, but at this place I would be glad if you

LABROWDER. The next is:

parole, by which the man's fitness for restoration to civil g the reenlistments, which have been considerable in and dealing only with restorations, the following is the

the men restored to duty from the disciplinary barracks ranches for the years 1914 to 1919, inclusive:

year 1914, 39; 1915, 139; 1916, 193; 1917, 436; 1918, 678;

1919, 17; total, 2,902.

LABROWDER. May I ask you right there, what has been the those men afterwards restored? Have you any record that you could give us what, generally, is the effect; that is, what they have done to justify the leniency, after they got back

LABROWDER. At the time Secretary Garrison approved the and issued General Order No. 56, he transferred the administration of the prisons from The Adjutant General's Department to my department, and placed me in charge, and I followed this matter that gave me up, very closely. My men were going back and completing courses of enlistment with a lower desertion rate than was made for those who reached their organizations through the recruit depots and the processes of enlistment. Not infrequently they became commissioned officers. But this act of March 4, 1915, by a circumstance which you will remember, for I think you served on the committee, Mr. Chairman, wrested the control of the regime from the Judge Advocate General's Department and gave it to The Adjutant General's Department, and since that time we have not had the means of following these restored men, and keeping what records they had made.

Completing what I had to say, 2,448 men were restored to duty between April 6, 1917, and August 31, 1919. The average sentence in years actually served by these men so restored is less than six months, or 0.49 of a year. Two thousand four hundred and forty-eight men restored served less than six months (average) in the disciplinary barracks. Within this average the prison commandant and his officers had judged that their reformation was so complete as to justify their being restored to duty with the colors.

Senator WARREN. You will give it as your judgment, will you, that those men restored, taking them by and large, as a lot, have rendered as good a class of service as the men who have been newly enlisted in the Army?

Gen. CROWDER. That was true up to the date when I lost the actual supervision.

Senator WARREN. Do you know anything to the contrary?

Gen. CROWDER. I do not know anything to the contrary since, and I know this, further, that during the time I was in charge I followed the actual expense to the Government of this process, and in comparison with the bringing of the men to the colors by enlistment through the recruit depots, the expense of this system was less per capita than the expense under the recruiting system.

Senator WARREN. We know that the expense of recruiting is excessive. Could you furnish us, later, so that it could go into your testimony, any statistics or any proper testimony as to what has been the change in these men since they went under the control of The Adjutant General?

Gen. CROWDER. The Adjutant General would have to furnish that information. I could not give it.

Senator WARREN. Could you give us any approximate idea of the average sentence of these men you have been speaking of?

Gen. CROWDER. Yes; by calling your attention to the average length of sentences imposed by general courts-martial for the entire period, namely, three and one-half years, about. In other words, the average sentence of three and one-half years was served, by these men, by an average confinement of less than six months. That would be the only comparison you could make that would furnish you an approximation of the amount of remission they earned by going to the disciplinary barracks and entering upon this course of military instruction.

Senator LENROOT. That average would evidently not apply, though, because for the longer sentences there would be a less number that would have the advantage of it.

Gen. CROWDER. It is true, and is published in my letter of March 10, which I shall refer to later as the Wigmore letter, prepared by Col. Wigmore and Maj. (now Lieut. Col.) Rigby, but signed by me, that certain men serving even these long-time sentences earned their restoration to duty in less than six months. That is already in the record before you. That has already been submitted for the consideration of this committee.

Senator Lenroot asked me a moment ago about the character of prison construction. Unfortunately the showing is not as favorable as I wish it might be. The chairman of the committee will have no difficulty in recalling when that prison construction was commenced. They laid out the prison just as penitentiaries are ordinarily constructed, with cell wings and doors, and all of the indicia that mark penal servitude. If you visited Leavenworth you would find a battalion of four companies in uniform marching all over the reservation under drill and instruction preparatory to being restored to duty, but when released from drill they return to places like that. The best that we could do was to take off the cell doors and leave them unobstructed access to the galleries that are found in each tier. But the prison construction was so far advanced—so nearly completed, in fact—that it was impossible to change it.

Senator LENROOT. Are these military prisoners kept in an entirely separate portion of the prison from other prisoners?

Gen. CROWDER. The segregation was complete during the time I administered the prisons. We found some barracks in the prison inclosure, and we kept these prisoners under military training in those barracks, but I do not think it has been possible to do that during the period of this war.

Senator LENROOT. Are there any of them in the same buildings at all with other prisoners?

Gen. CROWDER. I think there are.

Senator LENROOT. You think there are?

Gen. CROWDER. I think there are.

Senator LENROOT. So, to that extent, they have the same character of—

Gen. CROWDER. Yes; that is one unfortunate thing.

Senator LENROOT. Have any recommendations been made to Congress in that matter?

Gen. CROWDER. I think not. It was so impracticable, so improbable, rather, that Congress after appropriating the large sums of money that it had, under this mistaken theory of military penology, to construct what was in fact a military penitentiary, would condemn all of that property and rebuild, in accordance with the new idea: certainly not until the new idea had been tested.

Senator LENROOT. Would you say, however, that it was extremely important to carry out this reform?

Gen. CROWDER. Very important. I would like to think that we had military barracks everywhere to answer the purpose of these military reformatories, to give this idea a chance, and to keep this class of prisoners from association with men who are irreclaimable.

Senator WARREN. What is the distance from these quarters you have described; that is, from the regular Leavenworth Penitentiary to which criminals of all kinds are sent?

Gen. CROWDER. They are at the opposite end of the reservation, and are separated by a distance of 3 or 4 miles.

Senator WARREN. Both on the same side of the river?

Gen. CROWDER. Yes; but both on the military reservation.

The net result of our disciplinary barracks administration is that out of 13,593 men passing through the United States Disciplinary Barracks between April 1, 1917, and July 31, 1919 (including 2,101 in confinement on April 1, 1917, and 11,492 sentenced to the barracks between April 1, 1917, and July 31, 1919), only 3,839 remained in confinement in the various barracks on July 31, 1919; being only 1,738 more than were in the barracks at the beginning of the war, in spite of the great increase in the Army during the war, and of the number of unfit men of various kinds who were necessarily brought into the service through the operation of the draft.

Senator WARREN. On that date, July 31, can you tell us how many men we had in France?

Gen. CROWDER. I have not the statistics of the American Expeditionary Forces.

Senator WARREN. I wonder whether we could get that?

Gen. CROWDER. I think the recalling of Gen. Bethel would put you in the way of getting that information.

Senator WARREN. Would it be convenient for you to suggest to Gen. Bethel that we would be glad to have him furnish the committee with that information?

Gen. CROWDER. Yes, sir.

Senator WARREN. You would like to have it, Senator?

Senator LENROOT. Yes; I think so.

(The information desired is contained in the following note by Gen. Bethel:)

In France general prisoners were confined in two camps—at general intermediate storage depot (Gievres) and at St. Sulpice, near Bordeaux. Both these camps were under the jurisdiction of the commanding general Services of Supply. On June 13, 1919, that officer was directed to send all general prisoners to the United States as soon as transportation was available. On June 30, there remained in the two camps 108 general prisoners; on July 31 there were but 2. An indeterminate number were en route to the United States on July 31, 1919, either at Brest, in France, or on the seas. It is known that on August 12 there were but 34 remaining at Brest.

Gen. CROWDER. Although quite a proportion of the sentences to the disciplinary barracks were, nominally, for long terms of years, yet, in fact, the actual sentence served by the 9,754 men who were released from the barracks (including the men restored to the colors about whom I was talking a moment ago) during the period of the war, as above stated, averaged only 1.06 years.

During the month of August, 1919, the number of men in the barracks was further reduced, so that on August 30, 1919, only 3,728 men remained on confinement, or only 1,627 more than at the beginning of the war.

The purpose of the disciplinary barracks is to aid in the restoration of offenders; to make them, if worthy, good soldiers and good citizens. The period that a man is detailed in the barracks lies wholly in his own hands.

Senator WARREN. You rather emphasize what you stated earlier about these sentences all being conditional. We can understand that was as to time; that is, they should not exceed a certain time?

Gen. CROWDER. I made that plain, I think, by this statement. Those are maximum sentences. There is authority, of course, to hold the man for the entire period for which he is sentenced. It is written into the law by the very terms of the statute, authorizing suspension of the dishonorable discharge, that these men are there for the purpose of earning remission of that particular sentence of imprisonment and dishonorable discharge and getting them back into the service. This gives the sentence an indeterminate character. And let me emphasize it, because I may forget it, there is no minimum sentence.

Senator LENROOT. Are these sentences always of the same nature?

Gen. CROWDER. They are all of the same nature.

Senator LENROOT. They are all fixed sentences, but under the operation of the law they may be remitted?

Gen. CROWDER. In terms, yes—5, 10, 20, 40 years—but there is where the misapprehension has come. A 40-year sentence may, with good conduct, become a 6-months' sentence. I want this record to show that.

Senator LENROOT. You do not use that word "indeterminate" in the ordinary sense in which it is used in criminal law.

Gen. CROWDER. No; I am perfectly willing to say that, provided I do not allow anybody to think for a moment that it is not just as effective in the form in which we have it.

Senator LENROOT. It is just as effective, but it is not used in the sense in which the word "indeterminate" is used in the civil law.

Gen. CROWDER. No; the word "indeterminate" does not occur in our Articles of War at all. In this connection I find that I have some statistics here that answer the inquiry by Senator Lenroot. I have a statement showing the number of men restored to the colors from disciplinary barracks between April 6, 1917, and August 31, 1919, with the length of the average original sentence and the average sentence served. At the main branch disciplinary barracks, Fort Leavenworth, Kans., 1,410 men with an average sentence in years adjudged of 8.8 years, the average sentence in years actually served was 0.43 of a year.

Senator LENROOT. That is what I wanted to know.

Gen. CROWDER. At the Atlantic Branch of the United States Disciplinary Barracks at Fort Jay, N. Y., 470 men with an average sentence in years adjudged of 2.98 years, actually served an average sentence of 0.59 of a year.

At the Pacific Branch of the United States Disciplinary Barracks at Alcatraz, Calif., 568 men with an original average sentence adjudged of 2.17 years, served actually 0.57 of a year.

The total shows: Total number of men, 2,448, with an average sentence adjudged of 5.73 years, serving an average actual sentence of 0.49 of a year.

In tabular form the statistics are in this statement:

Statement showing number of men restored to the colors at United States Disciplinary Barracks between Apr. 6, 1917, and Aug. 31, 1919.

NOTE.—This statement does not include 124 men who during the period stated were restored to the colors and at once honorably discharged, and 13 men who during the same period were restored to the colors and discharged under paragraphs 139 and 150, Army Regulations, for the reason that the necessary information concerning these men is not available.

JOHN P. DINSMORE,
Lieutenant Colonel, Judge Advocate.

Senator LENROOT. Does any reason occur to you why there should be this difference in those three prisons? I notice in one of them you have a lower average for a longer term. In others you have a high average for a shorter term.

Gen. CROWDER. During the period of the war it seems Leavenworth was designated generally for the longer-term men, and the shorter-term men were held at Alcatraz and Jay. Perhaps that explains why the average sentence adjudged was so small for the prisoners confined at the Atlantic and Pacific branches.

Senator LENROOT. No; that is not what I gathered from your reading of those statistics. You have a longer average for the shorter average term in one case.

Gen. CROWDER. Yes; it has worked out that way.

Senator LENROOT. I do not see why it should be so.

Gen. CROWDER. Forty-three hundredths of a year at Leavenworth. 0.59 of a year at Fort Jay, and 0.57 of a year at Alcatraz.

Senator LENROOT. In one case the average sentence for your lowest average is very much higher than in the other case of the highest average.

Gen. CROWDER. I should say that the only reason for that was that the policy adopted at these different places was not uniform.

Senator LENROOT. That is what I was getting at, whether it was a difference of policy and recommendation.

Senator LENROOT. I should judge that it might indicate a more liberal policy in one institution than in the other.

Gen. CROWDER. It would seem to show a lack of coordination.

Senator WARREN. There might be a little difference in the character of the men.

Senator LENROOT. Yes.

Gen. CROWDER. It shows a lack of coordination of the prison administration in the three places, I think.

Senator LENROOT. Yes.

Gen. CROWDER. Something of that kind must explain it. I had hoped to find here some statistics which I had gathered which might possibly explain some of these long-term sentences—5, 10, 15, 25, and even 40 years—for the offense of absence without leave.

I called upon the port of embarkation at Hoboken for the number of men who were absent without leave from their organizations at the time they were expected to go up a gang plank and embark for Europe, because I knew the problem was concentrated largely there. These are some of the men of whom you have heard the story that they went home to see sick wives, fathers and mothers, and sweethearts. A great picture has been drawn for the contemplation of the American people of the cruelty toward these men.

Here are the statistics, and they show that the number of men who were absent without leave at the port of embarkation at Hoboken for the calendar year of 1918, at the time their organizations were due to embark for the theater of war, was approximately 14,098. I have no figures available for the year 1917, but the number of men transported to Europe that year was comparatively small. I can only explain these excessive sentences in this way: The call had come from Europe as early as March that the English had their backs to the English Channel and the French had their backs to Paris. The call was for bullets rather than bread.

As Provost Marshal General I had to furnish three times as many men as the schedule called for for April of that year; four times as many as the schedule called for for May; about the same percentage for June. The culminating peak was reached in July, during which month I furnished, under call, 401,000 men. The country was worked up to a higher pitch of excitement and insecurity than ever before. The officers who were expected to go abroad with their organizations and win battles found their commands disintegrating at the ports of embarkation. Unquestionably this fact affected the administration of military justice, and led to many of these heavy sentences. No one, I am sure, wishes to conceal or obscure the fact of heavy sentences. They were given. But little attention has been paid thus far to what must have been in the minds of the men who were adjudging these sentences, to do something at a critical period of the war for deterrent effect, knowing full well that this system of military penology which I have described to you would correct the evil of disproportionate punishment before any man had entered upon the execution of the excessive portion of his sentence; and I think you gentlemen may accept this as true, that during the period of the war, and ignoring for the moment any illegal convictions that may have taken place, no man has ever served one day of the excessive portion of the sentence adjudged by court-martial.

Senator LENROOT. That is, you mean if it was adjudged, it was reduced before he began his service?

Gen. CROWDER. Before he began the service of the excessive portion; and I think that point can not be too forcibly put. At least, I would like to have it controverted if it is not true. That is my best judgment, from a rather close study of the question.

Senator LENROOT. When a man was convicted and sentenced for 40 years, what became of him then, immediately?

Gen. CROWDER. He is held at the point of trial, or at some convenient place to which he may be sent, awaiting orders of transportation to the designated place of serving sentence. It may be one of these three disciplinary barracks, or it may be some place of execution provided by the commanding general of the American Expeditionary Forces in France; or in Siberia it may be some improvised place; or at Archangel an improvised place.

Senator LENROOT. When does the sentence begin?

Gen. CROWDER. It is reckoned from the date of approval of the sentence.

Senator LENROOT. If a man is sentenced to a year, and he remains 60 days in the guardhouse, do I understand that he serves a year from the date of the approval of the order additional?

Gen. CROWDER. No; he gets credit for all confinement served after the date of the approval of his sentence.

Senator LENROOT. Then, in effect, the service of the sentence begins——

Gen. CROWDER (interposing). On the date of approval.

Senator LENROOT (continuing). Not with the approval. In effect, I say, the service begins immediately upon the verdict of the court-martial?

Gen. CROWDER. In effect, that.

Senator LENROOT. Yes.

Gen. CROWDER. Unless there is some delay interposed between the action of the court and the action of the reviewing authority.

Senator LENROOT. So that, while technically you are correct, in a 40-year sentence he does enter upon the service of the sentence before there has been any reduction?

Gen. CROWDER. That is true; but I was careful to say before, he had not entered upon the execution of the excessive portion of his sentence—not the sentence, but the excessive portion. That is what I said.

Senator LENROOT. He could not enter upon the excessive portion of a 40-year sentence. He would have to serve a year——

Gen. CROWDER (interposing). I should assume that there was a period of confinement in all those cases that was justified, whereas the entire period was not justified, and that he had not entered upon the execution of the excessive portion at the time when clemency was granted.

Senator LENROOT. He could not have both. If it was reduced to 20 years, he could not enter upon the excessive portion until 20 years had elapsed. Suppose that it was reduced to two years, or three years; he could not enter upon the excessive portion until after two years.

Gen. CROWDER. No; the point that I wanted to get before the committee was that if all these sentences had been excessive, the prisoner had not suffered by it except in name, because he had not served any part of the excessive portion at the time clemency reached him.

Senator LENROOT. That would be almost inevitably true, would it not, in every case?

Gen. CROWDER. I do not believe that the people of this country understand that.

Senator LENROOT. You think that the people of the country believe——

Gen. CROWDER (interposing). I think there is a vast amount of misapprehension in the minds of the people of the country, that men have actually executed—served out—these excessive sentences.

Senator LENROOT. How could they have served out a 20-year sentence which was imposed only two or three years ago?

Gen. CROWDER. But suppose it was a 20-year sentence where only one year was justified. It would then be a question as to whether the man had been kept in prison one year. That is the point that I want to cover, that I do not believe there are any of them—and I disregard illegal convictions where no sentence would have been justified—taking the legal convictions, I do not believe there are any of them where any part of the sentence in excess of what was justified has been served.

Senator LENROOT. Beyond the time of the proper sentence?

Gen. CROWDER. No.

Senator LENROOT. I see. I think that is probably true.

Gen. CROWDER. I think that is absolutely true.

Senator WARREN. Detention in the guardhouse has been only, I suppose, until they could send them under proper guard?

Gen. CROWDER. Yes. Perhaps there may have been inexcusable delay in some cases.

Senator WARREN. I wanted to bring that up, because that has been charged, that men have been put in uncomfortable places and sent to general disciplinary barracks.

Gen. CROWDER. Perhaps this is the proper time to refer to a distinction which I find it very important to keep in mind in expressing some judgment upon these court-martial sentences. I do not see how we can hope for a discriminating, fair, and sane judgment unless we keep in mind that courts-martial try common law and statutory offenses as well as purely military offenses. At the time I made my inspection at Leavenworth in 1911, a time which reflected peace conditions and peace-time administration of military justice, the percentage of common law and statutory offenders only, convicted by courts-martial, to the total number in confinement there was 8 per cent. In 1917 the figures show that it was 10 per cent at Fort Leavenworth Barracks; and in 1918, 19 per cent; and without pursuing these statistics further it will be sufficient to say that during the war period the number of soldiers convicted of common law or statutory offenses on the one hand as compared with military offenses on the other, was 14 per cent.

Senator LENROOT. How do you explain that? Would not one assume, rather, that the reverse would be the case, that the percentage would be smaller?

Gen. CROWDER. I do not undertake to explain why the percentage is higher for the war period. My point is made when I call attention to the fact that the proportion between military offenses and civil offenses is, for the war period, about 86 of the former to 14 of the latter; and for the peace period the proportion of military offenses is even greater. Eighty-six per cent of the cases you are called upon to consider in providing a code of military justice are essentially military cases, and 14 per cent common law and statutory cases. And the fact that affects my judgment when I come to consider this question of an appellate tribunal—and I am going to refer to it later—I am just reserving the question now, and saying only that I think the fact profoundly affects the conclusion to be reached as to the character of the appellate tribunal, that in time of war not more than 14 per cent of the cases that would come before such a tribunal are common law and statutory cases, and that 86 per cent of the cases that would come before it are offenses against the discipline of the Army. I say I just reserve that to be discussed when we come to discuss the question of appellate power.

Senator LENROOT. I want to go back just for one question: With reference to the excessive sentences, including those for absence without leave, did I understand you to state that those were solely for absences without leave at the port of embarkation?

Gen. CROWDER. No; I just gave that as one illustration. I would not like to have the thought rest in anyone's mind for a moment that I was trying to cover the case——

Senator LENROOT. No; I just wanted to know what the fact was.

Gen. CROWDER. Would you like to have in the record at this time a statement showing the number of men confined in disciplinary barracks and penitentiaries during the war?

Senator LENROOT. I think that is already in the record, but if it is not I think it ought to go in.

Gen. CROWDER. I doubt very much whether it has been presented by any other witness before you.

Senator LENROOT. Then it may go in.

Gen. CROWDER. Before the war was declared, namely, on April 1, 1917, there were in the three disciplinary barracks 2,101 men, and 212 men in the penitentiaries.

Between April 1, 1917, and July 31, 1919, there were sent to the disciplinary barracks 11,492, and to the penitentiaries 1,352.

So that the total is 13,593 in the disciplinary barracks, as against 1,564 in the penitentiaries.

Of the men remaining in confinement on July 31, 1919, there were 3,839 in the disciplinary barracks and 835 in the penitentiaries.

Now you will say, or will have the right to say, that these figures are not consistent with my percentages of convictions mentioned a while ago. The explanation lies in this, that in the 1916 revision of the Articles of War it was provided that desertion in time of war and repeated desertion in time of peace should constitute felonies, and a good many of those men who are serving in the penitentiaries are deserters in time of war or repeaters, and not the usual common law and statutory felon.

Senator LENROOT. Where is the line drawn between absence without leave and desertion?

Gen. CROWDER. The distinguishing element is the intention not to return, or to permanently abandon the service.

Senator LENROOT. I knew that, but the difference in administration is what I was getting at.

Gen. CROWDER. The effort we make in practical administration, to draw that line. There is one merit about the pending Chamberlain bill that ought not to escape notice, and that is the creation of what the British call short-time desertion. It is provided for in the Chamberlain bill, but not under that name. If we had had a statute of that kind, these more than 14,000 men that were absent at Hoboken at the time they were expected to embark could have been tried for short desertion, or an abandonment of the command at a time of perilous duty. They distinguish that in the English articles as short-time desertion, and in effect, though not in name, it is made short-time desertion in the Chamberlain bill, and I want to commend that part of the bill. I believe it would be an improvement, and if we had that legislation these absentees would have been "short-time deserters," punishable under article 55 of the Chamberlain-Ansell bill with death, and presumably then the voice of criticism hurled against the sentences of lesser severity actually imposed upon these men for absence without leave would not have been so audible.

I now come to the second subdivision of my remarks, the Bill of Rights and its applicability or nonapplicability to military accused persons:

Where I have undertaken to state the views of the critics of the present system, I have resorted to quotation marks, and given the page reference to the hearings, in the interest of absolute, unerring accuracy.

Gen. Ansell says on page 125 of these hearings:

It had long been and still is the contention of the so-called lawyers of the War Department that not one single clause or legal principle in the Constitution, in the Bill of Rights, or any other of these ancient documents that have come down to us as a part of our birthright, to secure our liberties against government, not one is applicable to courts-martial—including this great protection against second trial. (P. 125.) (The double jeopardy principle of the Constitution.)

Frequent references of this character appear in the literature of this court-martial controversy. It was expected that, as announced, it would shock the country, and it has shocked the country. I want the attention of the committee to the following propositions:

A. It is true that the Congress of the United States has for more than a century legislated in substantial accord with the view which Gen. Ansell condemns.

Permit me to show just what Congress has done in this regard by citing the several clauses of the Bill of Rights and the corresponding provisions of the Articles of War enacted by our Congress.

BILL OF RIGHTS.

No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land and naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger. (Fifth amendment.)

Nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb. (Fifth amendment.)

Nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself. (Fifth amendment.)

Nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. (Fifth amendment.)

In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial. (Sixth amendment.)

ARTICLES OF WAR.

By express provision this amendment does not apply to the land forces.

No person shall be tried a second time for the same offense. (Art. 87, Code of 1806; art. 40, Revision of 1916.)

No witness before a military court, commission, court of inquiry, or board, or before any officer, military or civil, designated to take a deposition to be read in evidence before any military court, commission, court of inquiry, or board, shall be compelled to incriminate himself or to answer any questions which may tend to incriminate or degrade him. (A. W., 24; Revision of 1916; act of Mar. 2, 1901; 31 Stat., 950, 951.)

What is due process of law in criminal prosecutions? It includes jurisdiction by trial court of person and subject matter, notice of charges upon which an accused is to be tried, opportunity to be heard thereon in a fair trial and under equal and uniform rules of procedure. As said in Reeves v. Ainsworth (291 U. S., 296, 304): "To those in the military or naval service of the United States the military law is due process." In other words, due process of law is afforded the accused when he is tried by such procedure as acts of Congress and the common law, military, have provided.

No person put in arrest shall be continued in confinement more than 8 days, or until such time as a court-martial can be assembled. When any person is put in arrest for the purpose of trial, except at remote military posts or stations, the officer by whose order he is arrested shall see that a copy of the charges on which he is to be tried is served upon him within 8 days after his arrest, and that he is brought to trial within 10 days thereafter, unless the necessities of the service prevent such trial; and then he shall be brought to trial within 30 days after the expiration of said 10 days. If a copy of the charges be not served, or the arrested person be not brought to trial, as herein required, the arrest shall cease. (Revision of 1916, A. W. 70; origin, first sentence, art. 79, Code of 1806, rest of provision, act of July 17, 1862.)

By an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law. (Sixth amendment.)

And to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation. (Sixth amendment.)

To be confronted with witnesses against him. (Sixth amendment.)

While the trial is not required by statute to be always public, it is the almost universal practice, departed from only in rare instances and in case of necessity, where the evidence must because of the military situation be kept secret, or because it is otherwise of a character which requires the court to sit behind closed doors.

Held in ex parte Milligan (71 U. S. 2. 123) not to apply to courts-martial, in language as follows: "The sixth amendment affirms that 'in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury,' language broad enough to embrace all persons and cases; but the fifth, recognizing the necessity of an indictment, or presentment, before anyone can be held to answer for high crimes, 'excepts cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service, in time of war or public danger;' and the framers of the Constitution doubtless meant to limit the right of trial by jury, in the sixth amendment, to those persons who were subject to indictment or presentment in the fifth."

See A. W. 70, last above quoted, and act of July 17, 1862.

Congress has legislated in the teeth of this provision, authorizing depositions in all cases not capital. The first enactment on this subject is found in article 74 of the Code of 1806; carried forward in the Code of 1874, article 91, and, in both codes, gave this authority to take depositions to both Government and accused persons upon reasonable notice, as a right. The existing provision is found in articles 25 and 26 of the existing code and continues in that code as a right, not a privilege. So it is that from the very beginning of our Government down to the present time Congress has recognized the inapplicability of this particular clause of the Bill of Rights to military accused persons.

Senator LENROOT. I would like to ask you right there what you have to say, aside from the practice adopted by Congress, or of the proper construction we may say, given by Congress to that, in view of what was said in the Milligan case? The Milligan case draws the distinction, or rather goes back to the inception of a military court, in the way of indictment or information, as sustaining its position in the right of trial by jury. But do you think that same thing should apply in case of the right to be confronted with the witnesses?

Gen. CROWDER. Yes; I am coming to that, in the language of the Supreme Court itself.

Senator LENROOT. That is what I was coming to.

Gen. CROWDER. The next is:

To have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor. (Sixth amendment.)

And to have the assistance of counsel for his defense. (Fifth amendment.)

Right fully secured by article 22. Judge advocates have the same power to compel witnesses to appear and testify as criminal courts of the United States. Failure of civilian witness to obey process is made punishable by A. W. 23, and such failure of military witness is likewise punishable. (Origin of A. W. 22, act of Mar. 3, 1863, and of A. W. 23, act of Mar. 2, 1901.)

Existing article of war 17 provides that "The accused shall have the right to be represented before the court by counsel of his own selection for his defense if such counsel be reasonably available, but should he for any reason be unrepresented by counsel, the judge advocate shall, from time to time throughout the proceedings, advise the accused of his legal rights." (Judge advocate to protect accused, act of Apr. 10, 1806, art. 69. Rest of provision, act of Aug. 29, 1916.)

Now, you will at once say that that is not the substantial right to counsel that is enjoyed by a civil accused in civil courts, and I admit it. Let us have no question about it. The provision here "reasonably available," is sought to be eliminated in the bill before you (art. 22) and it will bring up for consideration the case that I presented to the committee at the time the 1916 revision was under consideration, an actual case of an officer being tried by a court-martial in Alaska for embezzlement, making an application for the professor of law at the Military School, Staff College, at Leavenworth, to be sent all the way to Alaska for his defense. It might result in an accused person undergoing trial in Mindanao, in the Philippine Islands, applying for some man serving in Alaska to act as his counsel. Upon that explanation, the Military Committee of the House, which first wanted to grant the right of counsel in absolute terms, qualified it by the language "If such counsel be reasonably available." The corresponding provision of the pending bill is that military counsel of the accused's selection shall be assigned, unless the appointing authority shall certify that "serious injury to the service" would result from the detail. What is serious injury? Is it to be measured in dollars and cents of transportation or mileage? Is one class of duty to be measured against another? Are we here in the field of prejudicial error; or, because compliance with a statute is involved, are we in the field of jurisdictional error?

No provision is made in the existing code for civil counsel, because it is not of record, I believe, anywhere, nor do I believe it is true that an accused who sought to be represented by a civil counsel before a court-martial was ever denied that right. You have gone further in the pending bill and have provided that that civil attorney shall be paid by the Government if the accused is found not guilty, I believe, and if he is convicted civil counsel is to be paid by the man. I think that is the provision of the pending bill. But what I wish to emphasize is that Congress did not fail, in the revision of 1916, to extend to an accused right of counsel, and leave you to judge of the and the necessity of strengthening the military justice system.

all known in military service

Art. 1 of the existing code of military justice provided that "Punishment by flogging, branding, marking, or tattooing the body is prohibited." (Original Act Aug. 1, 1890.)

Whenever the punishment for a crime or offense made punishable by these articles is left to the discretion of the court-martial, the punishment shall not, in time of peace, exceed such limit of time as the President may from time to time prescribe. Present 45th article of war. (Original Act Sept. 27, 1890.)

From the beginning, taking the articles of war of 1775, the next succeeding code of 1776, the amended articles of 1786, the adaptation of all those Revolutionary War articles to the Constitution by the Congress of the United States in 1806, the Articles of War as they existed from 1806 down to 1874 when the revised statutes were enacted, and down to September 27, 1890, the punitive articles generally expressed in the language "shall be punished as a court-martial shall direct." It was not until 1863 that we had any provision of the statute law respecting cruel and unusual punishments. Congress prohibited flogging and branding in the Army. Flogging had been a punishment in the early days, but it had not survived a protracted term when Congress abolished it; but branding of the forehead with the letter "D" on his cap had survived, and Congress abolished it in the early war period. But down to September 20, 1890, with the exception of capital punishment which could not be inflicted except where expressly authorized, there was nothing to regulate maximum punishments, and the result was, as I recall the situation when I was serving in the Department of Texas, one set of punishments in one military department and another set in another, with varying degrees of punishments for the same offense. Finally Congress was compelled to establish some kind of regulation, and enacted the act of September 27, 1890 (26 Stat. 491, supra), at the request of the War Department.

Immediately upon the passage of the act of September 27, 1890, the President got out maximum limits of punishment for all offenses that were punishable at the discretion of the court, and we consulted in the preparation of that list of maximum punishments the penal code of the United States, and, of course, the customary war punishments for military offenses, which were not covered in the penal code of the United States. There has been, since that date, a continuing regulation of maximum punishments for time of peace. When war breaks out this statute ceases to operate. I venture the assertion that if we had entered the war with that phrase "in time of peace" eliminated, you gentlemen would never have heard anything, nor would the country have heard anything, about excessive sentences. If I had my way about it I would regulate the whole thing by striking out the words "in time of peace," and leave this maximum punishment order to operate both in peace and war, at the discretion of the President.

who would lay before Congress periodically his orders on the subject. I think if you would take the maximum-punishment orders that have been issued since this legislation was enacted, you would be struck with the care that has been exercised and the humane provisions made in them on the general subject. Had it been in operation during the period of this war, I can readily conceive of the President prescribing that in home territory, 3,000 miles from the theater of war, the conditions of service sufficiently approximate a period of peace to recognize certain prescribed limits of punishment. He might have said, "We will leave that matter in the theater of war to the discretion of courts-martial." He might have said with greater propriety to the military force operating in Siberia under Gen. Graves that we would leave the discretion to courts-martial; or even in the Archangel theater. But, in any event, he could have moved as the situation justified, to establish these limits. There has always been a strong army opinion against regulating the discretion of courts-martial as to punishment in time of war, and the Kernan-O'Ryan-Ogden report, which is before you, takes very advanced ground on that subject. I dissent in that regard from the Kernan-O'Ryan-Ogden report. I want this other method tried as a practical means of regulating what has disturbed the country a great deal.

Now, of course, you will reach your conclusion after due consideration of the very forceful argument submitted by the Kernan-O'Ryan-Ogden Board. It might be well to hear some of the commanders of fighting units in France on the question whether it is practicable to regulate the discretion of courts-martial in matters of punishment in the zone of actual military operations. But my judgment, as at present advised, is to the effect that it would be wise to have the President clothed with this authority, to be exercised or not as he saw fit. Certainly the responsibility would be definite, for the establishment of safeguards against excessive punishments, if this statute were operative in time of war as well as in time of peace.

Senator LENROOT. Let me ask you this question: If the committee should determine to revive the maximum sentences, and have them apply to time of peace only, but give the President the power to make regulations applying to time of war, what would you say?

Gen. CROWDER. That would be the least objectionable way of placing the matter under congressional regulation; but I should like to ask this question: Why disturb the operation of a law that has worked so satisfactorily in time of peace heretofore? Take the actual administration of military justice since September 27, 1890, down to April 6, 1917, and see if there is any occasion for Congress to fix arbitrarily the limits of punishment by courts-martial. If this other scheme has worked, why abandon it? Of course, that will be one of the matters for the committee to determine: Have there been any abuses during this peace period? I have read the testimony before this committee carefully, and no one so far as I can find has argued the failure of the act of September 27, 1890, and executive orders issued thereunder, to operate effectively to safeguard the administration of military justice in this regard. I do not feel like making a change unless there is some necessity for it.

Senator LENROOT. Do you think it is desirable, General, to have the court-martial inflict what are really excessive punishments, so that as a rule they are reduced?

Gen. CROWDER. No; I do not.

Senator LENROOT. Is not that one of the questions?

Gen. CROWDER. Yes; for the war period; but, as a rule, they did not have to be reduced during time of peace.

Senator WARREN. The President makes those orders. Would they not come naturally, almost entirely and exclusively, from opinions rendered to him by the Judge Advocate General?

Gen. CROWDER. Clemency orders? Yes; almost entirely.

Senator WARREN. From his advice?

Gen. CROWDER. The clemency section of the Judge Advocate General's Office is always a very busy section, going over the records every time an application for clemency comes in, and measuring out to a man all the clemency that his offense will admit of or his good conduct merits.

Senator WARREN. Yes; I understand that; but my idea was, the President issuing regulations from time to time in the matter as to what should be the degree of punishment, whether he would not be obliged to get the suggestion and arguments and reasons from the Judge Advocate General? Would the matter not go back to the Judge Advocate General's office?

Gen. CROWDER. I understand. You are speaking, not of clemency orders, but of these maximum punishment orders. I can say this, that during my period of service as Judge Advocate General, now exceeding eight years, every revision of the maximum punishment order has been prepared in my office, and I have reason to believe that prior to my day, under Gen. Lieber and Gen. Davis, every maximum punishment order was prepared by the Judge Advocate General. We never had but one issue with the General Staff as to limits of punishments, and that was as to the limit for desertion. The General Staff thought that the limit of confinement should be equal to the period of the enlistment; if the enlistment was for five years the desertion should be punishable with a sentence of five years. It was at one time adopted and almost immediately abandoned. I led the fight to have it abandoned, because there is such a difference between desertion committed in the first 30 days of a man's enlistment and a desertion committed in the last 30 days of the man's enlistment.

Now, resuming my discussion of the protection accorded to military accused before courts-martial, I think it is obvious, from the foregoing comparison, that notwithstanding the fact that the rights and privileges accorded by the bill of rights to persons accused of crime have not been recognized by Congress as applicable to military offenders or offenses; nevertheless the Congress has by statute—the Articles of War and Rules of Procedure issued thereunder—with few exceptions secured those rights in large measure to such offenders, the noticeable exceptions being, trial by jury and the right to be confronted by witnesses in noncapital cases. With these two exceptions, practically every provision of the Bill of Rights, which individuals in general are entitled to invoke, is accorded by statute law in the measure deemed advisable by Congress, to offenders against military law. This may be shown more clearly by the following summary:

(a) Provision that there shall be no second jeopardy of life or limb is amply secured by the fortieth article of war which provides that "no person shall be tried the second time for the same offense."

the provision for a speedy and public trial is amply secured by Article 1 of the Articles of War; but no provision for such trial in the "jurisdiction district" in which the crime is committed is made, because it is not possible of application to military offenses, particularly in cases of war or public danger. While the trial is not required by the Articles to be always public, it is the almost universal practice, having departed from only in case of necessity, as where evidence cannot be disclosed, being of a military nature arising in the course of war, or where scandalous in nature and of a character which would vilify the courts close also.

The impartiality of the members of the court is secured by the challenge for cause. (A. W. 18.)

We have not the peremptory challenge, as you know, but they are not to introduce it. We will speak of that later.

The requirement that no person be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself is not only found in our statute books, likewise in the Manual, and is in practice carefully observed. (M. C. M., pars. 214-215, pp. 103-104; pars. 234-236, pp. 115-118; Ops. J. A. G., 1912, p. 502.)

The accused is also protected from unreasonable search, prohibited from producing private books, papers, or effects to be used against him in his trial. (M. C. M., pars. 214-215, pp. 103-104; pars. 234-236, pp. 115-118; A. W. 24; Ops. J. A. G., 1912, p. 502.)

The accused is likewise to be, and is, informed of his rights to remain silent, to refrain from testifying in his own behalf, and any statement or confession made before the trial is carefully scrutinized to determine that it is not obtained under any compulsion or duress. (M. C. M., par. 215, pp. 103-104; pars. 225-226, pp. 110-113; par. 40.)

The right of the accused to have the assistance of counsel for his defense is accorded in the Articles of War, and the Manual expressly provides for this right in cases of general or special courts-martial and permits counsel of his own selection if such counsel be readily available (M. C. M., pars. 108-110, pp. 51-52; A. W. 17). Although civilian counsel is not provided for at Government expense, the recognition upon the right of the accused to have civilian counsel is imposed by his own financial ability. By amendments to the Articles for Courts-Martial which were promulgated July 14, 1919, on General Order of the War Department, every officer convening a court-martial is now required, in the convening order, to detail a defense counsel for the accused, to act for all accused persons who do not have their own counsel; and to be available, if desired by the accused, as associate counsel when the accused has counsel of his own. Provision is also made for excusing military counsel from other duties, to give them the opportunity to prepare the defense of the case. (Changes No. 1, M. C. M., July 14, 1919, pars. 108-109.)

The right to be confronted with the witnesses against him is secured to the accused in capital cases, and habitually in noncapital cases, although the Articles of War secure to both the Government and the accused the right to take depositions in noncapital cases. (M. C. M., par. 165, p. 80.)

The right to compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in the defense of the accused is fully recognized and secured by the practice in capital cases, although reasonable limitations are imposed because of the nature of military service. (M. C. M., par. 161, p. 78.) In practice any witness requested by the defendant is usually summoned, and I know, after prolonged military service, of no instance where a witness requested by a military defendant has not been summoned where the denial would constitute prejudicial error.

It is easy to imagine a case where an accused in the Philippines asks for a witness from Alaska, that that witness be sent all the way to the Philippines to testify in a noncapital case, the answer would be, "Congress has provided for that case, and you will have to have these depositions."

Senator LENROOT. Right in that connection, I think you stated that you have a decision in the Supreme Court of the United States upon that question of being confronted with the witnesses.

Gen. CROWDER. What is that?

Senator LENROOT. Did you say that the Supreme Court had passed upon the question of the right to be confronted by witnesses?

Gen. CROWDER. No. Further on I will show you the scope of the judicial decisions. That is the next part of my statement.

Senator LENROOT. Very well.

Gen. CROWDER. (j) The right to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation is fully secured and copies of the charges are required to be served on the accused in time to prepare his defense. (M. C. M., pars. 79-80, p. 42; par. 96, p. 48; A. W. 70.)

(k) The only prohibition against the infliction of cruel and unusual punishments and excessive fines in military cases is found in article of war 41, prohibiting flogging, or branding, marking or tattooing of the body, and article 45, which regulates maximum punishments in time of peace. It should, in my judgment, be made effective in war-time punishments by extending to the President the power to regulate maximum punishments at such a time, and thereby render impossible of occurrence some very excessive sentences which marked the administration of military justice during this war. If any good can come from the provision of the pending bill (art. 44) in enacting the general language of the Constitution prohibiting cruel and unusual punishments by courts-martial, let it be done; but while excessive punishments have been alleged and proved, not one that was cruel and unusual in kind or degree has been alleged.

(l) The security against conviction of treason, except upon confession in open court or the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, is expressly secured to persons in the Army accused of that crime. (M. C. M., sec. 248, p. 122.)

(m) There is no suspension of the privilege of habeas corpus, as applied to persons in the Army, except upon the same terms as applied to persons generally, and military persons are as free to use that writ as are civilians.

Now, my second proposition is this:

B. It is likewise true that the courts of the United States have announced the view of nonapplicability of the Bill of Rights, so vigorously condemned by Gen. Ansell.

Among the judicial pronouncements on this question is Ex parte Milligan (71 U. S. (4 Wall.), 2, 123), decided in 1866. Mr. Justice Davis, delivering the opinion of the court, said:

The sixth amendment affirms that "in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury," language broad enough to embrace all persons and cases; but the fifth, recognizing the necessity of an indictment, or presentment, before anyone can be held to answer for his crimes, "excepts cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service, in time of war or public danger": and the framers of the Constitution, doubtless, meant to limit the right of trial by jury, in the sixth amendment, to those persons who were subject to indictment or presentment in the fifth.

In the concurring opinion of Mr. Chief Justice Waite, we find the following language:

The Constitution itself provides for military government as well as for civil government. And we do not understand it to be claimed that the civil safeguards of the Constitution have application in cases within the proper sphere of the former.

It is not denied that the power to make rules for the government of the Army and Navy is a power to provide for trial and punishment by military courts without a jury. It has been so understood and exercised from the adoption of the Constitution to the present time.

Nor, in our judgment, does the fifth, or any other amendment, abridge that power.

Senator LENROOT. That, however, is not a majority opinion.

Gen. CROWDER. No, but it is a concurring opinion. (Continuing reading:)

"Cases arising in the land and naval forces, or in the militia in actual service in time of war or public danger," are expressly excepted from the fifth amendment, "that no person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury," and it is admitted that the exception applies to the other amendments as well as to the fifth.

Those are the three judges that joined with Chief Justice Waite. [Continuing reading:]

We think, therefore, that the power of Congress, in the government of the land and naval forces and of the militia, is not at all affected by the fifth or any other amendment.

Now, that was not the opinion of Chief Justice Waite only, who was the Chief Justice at that time, but also of the three judges that concurred with him.

In re Bogart (Fed. Cases, No. 1596), decided in 1873, is another case directly in point. In that case Judges Sawyer, circuit judge, and Hoffman, district judge, sitting at circuit, squarely held (quoting from syllabi):

4. The power of Congress to provide for the government of the land and naval forces is not affected or limited by the fifth, or any other amendment.

In addition to the foregoing, there is the following supporting dictum from Ex parte Milligan, supra,

The discipline necessary to the efficiency of the Army and Navy requires other and swifter modes of trial than are furnished by the common-law courts; and in pursuance to the power conferred by the Constitution, Congress has declared the kinds of trial and the manner in which they shall be conducted, for offenses committed while the party is in the military or naval service.

My third proposition is this:

C. It is likewise true that military text writers have adopted the view of the nonapplicability of the Bill of Rights condemned by Gen. Ansell.

Winthrop—and Gen. Ansell very properly refers to him as the Blackstone of military law, a man of superb reasoning power—Winthrop, in his Military Law and Precedents, vol. 1, page. 241, discussing the right of an accused to counsel, and announcing that orders of the War Department require that commanders of posts shall detail without request of an accused a suitable officer as his counsel, says:

But in general it is to be said that the admission of counsel for the accused in military cases is not a right but a privilege only—

Citing in support of this view the following text writers: McArthur, writing between 1792 and 1813; McComb in 1809; Tyler in 1814; Benét in 1863–1868; Hough in 1825–1855; Hughes in 1845; and Kennedy in 1847. As against this he cites a single American author—De Hart in 1846–1862. Winthrop continues his comment, that notwithstanding it is held to be a privilege only, it is—

Yet a privilege almost invariably acceded to, and as a matter of course; and that, whether the counsel proposed to be introduced be a military or civil, professional or unprofessional person.

In a foot note, Winthrop further discusses the matter in language as follows:

Article VI of the amendments to the Constitution provides that “in all criminal prosecutions” the accused shall “have the assistance of counsel for his defense.” The reference here is to prosecutions before the criminal courts of the United States only. (Barron v. Mayor of Baltimore, 7 Peters, 243; Ex parte Watkins, Id. 573; Twitchell v. Com., 7 Wallace, 326; Edwards v. Elliott, 21 Id., 557; Walker v. Sauvinet, 92 U. S., 90; Pearson v. Yewdall, 95 U. S., 294; I Bishop, C. L. No. 725; Wharton, C. P. & P. No. 290.) Military courts, however, though not bound by the letter, are within the spirit of the provision.

Now, that is a summary of the views of text writers.

Next I come to a rather important part of this subject. Upon this question of the applicability of the Bill of Rights to military accused and military offenses, I have reviewed under heading “A” the legislative precedents showing that Congress has legislated upon the theory of the nonapplicability of the Bill of Rights; under “B” the judicial precedents down to 1873, showing that the courts of the United States adopted that view of nonapplicability; and “C” the textbook doctrine to the same effect. But Gen. Ansell says that all of this doctrine of nonapplicability was swept away in a leading case in military law (Grafton v. U. S., 206 U. S., 333, 348) decided in 1907. He says:

There was involved in that case an issue in which I was then and still am deeply interested, and that is, the very character of these courts-martial, and how far these principles of the Bill of Rights and the other principles of the law—common law, Anglo-American law—are applicable to these courts-martial in order to secure a fair trial. I say this was the issue involved. (Record of Hearings, p. 125.)

Then he proceeds with this statement:

The court took occasion to say this: “We base our decision not upon the fact that this clause of the Constitution of the United States has been carried to the Philippines by congressional enactment; we do not base this decision on the fact that Congress has enacted, in the old fortieth article of war, an inhibition against double jeopardy. We base it upon the fact that the Constitution of the United States applies, regardless of legislation.” (Record of Hearings, p. 126.)

Gen. Ansell adds the further comment:

And yet, apparently, the Judge Advocate General's Department of the Army until recently have never seen the great point of that case. (Record of Hearings, p. 126.)

Gen. Ansell says further:

The Grafton case holds that the protection against double jeopardy a man gets when tried by court-martial comes not from statute, but from the Bill of Rights of our Constitution (p. 264).

I am frank to say to this committee that if the language which Gen. Ansell here attributes to the Supreme Court in this case were, in fact, uttered by the court, it would determine the question in accordance with his contention. I have been unable to find that language, and three officers of my department who have been given the task to scan the decision fail to find this language in the decision of the Supreme Court.

I want you gentlemen now to look at Ansell's testimony, where it is put down. I would like to ask, first, whether or not he is attributing that language to the Supreme Court, and then whether it can be found.

Senator LENROOT. What is the volume of the Supreme Court decisions; have you the citation there?

Gen. CROWDER. I have the citation right here. It is the case of Grafton v. United States (206 U. S., pp. 333-348).

Now, it is a serious thing to charge, and I do not charge, Gen. Ansell with having attributed language to the Supreme Court which it did not utter, but I ask you whether or not this ought not to be verified before it goes out to the public as having been stated before the Military Committee?

Senator LENROOT. Did you note this language, Senator [indicating record]?

Senator WARREN. Yes.

Gen. CROWDER. I can not find it. I mentioned the matter to a Senator who happened to be in my office, and he said, "You must be mistaken. No man would attribute language to the Supreme Court that can not be found." Then I asked another lawyer to come over here to the Capitol and examine the original opinion and briefs in the case, to see if that language was used by the court or in any of the contending briefs, and he reported back that that language was not to be found.

Let me say further: In the Grafton case, counsel for the accused contended that his acquittal by the court-martial forbade his being again tried in the civil court for the same offense, basing that contention in part upon that clause of the fifth amendment of the Constitution providing: "Nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb," and in part upon the act of Congress of July 1, 1902, providing temporarily for the administration of the affairs of civil government in the Philippine Islands, and which act likewise embraced a double jeopardy provision in language reading somewhat differently from the double jeopardy clause in the fifth amendment, to wit: "No person, for the same offense, shall be twice put in jeopardy of punishment" (32 Stat., 691); and the court in concluding its opinion said:

But passing by all other questions discussed by counsel or which might arise on the record and restricting our decision to the above question of double jeopardy, we adjudge that, consistently with the above act of 1902 and for the reasons stated, the plaintiff in error, a soldier in the Army, having been acquitted of the crime of homicide alleged to have been committed by him in the Philippines, by a military court of competent jurisdiction, proceeding under the authority of the United States, could not be subsequently tried for the same offense in a civil court exercising authority in that Territory.

In other words the court refer to one of the contentions, namely the contention that the act of 1902 applied, and say, "consistently with that act" we hold, etc. Now, there is some other language in the decision of the Supreme Court which I want to quote, in all fairness to Gen. Ansell. The only language of the decision in the Grafton Case which in any manner tends to support Gen. Ansell's construction is the following:

The express prohibition of double jeopardy for the same offense means that wherever such prohibition is applicable, either by operation of the Constitution or by action of Congress, no person shall be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb for the same offense. Consequently a civil court proceeding under the authority of the United States can not withhold from an officer or soldier of the Army the full benefit of that guaranty after he has been once tried in a military court of competent jurisdiction. Congress, by express constitutional provision, has the power to prescribe rules for the government and regulation of the Army, but those rules must be interpreted in connection with the prohibition against a man's being put twice in jeopardy for the same offense. The former provision must not be so interpreted as to nullify the latter.

But construing this with the closing language of the opinion cited supra, only that was decided in the Grafton case which had to be decided to dispose of the case. It follows that so much of the discussion of the court as is broader than the clear issue under the statutory jeopardy clause enacted for the Philippines is in the nature of "obiter dictum" and without binding effect.

An analysis of Grafton v. United States shows that that case by no means disposes of the doctrine of the applicability to courts-martial of the jeopardy clause of the fifth amendment to the Constitution.

Senator LENROOT. Your position, then, is that the Supreme Court has never authoritatively passed upon the position at all?

Gen. CROWDER. First, my position is that I can not find this language attributed to the Supreme Court. If it was there, I would concede the point.

My second point is that the Grafton case does not dispose of the question.

Senator LENROOT. Generally, your position is that the Supreme Court has in no case decided this question?

Gen. CROWDER. I do not find that it has.

Senator LENROOT. You read the Milligan case and the other case, and there they did not pass upon it?

Gen. CROWDER. There the statement is that neither the fifth nor any other amendment is applicable.

Senator LENROOT. No; not in the majority opinion.

Gen. CROWDER. Not in the majority opinion; but in In re Bogart, which followed it seven years later, that point was decided.

Senator LENROOT. That is obiter.

Gen. CROWDER. No; I quote right from the syllabus of the case. In In re Bogart the ruling was direct to the point that neither the fifth nor any other amendment is applicable.

Senator LENROOT. No; but that is not the Supreme Court.

Gen. CROWDER. Not the Supreme Court.

Senator LENROOT. I said the Supreme Court has never passed upon it.

Gen. CROWDER. It has not passed upon the exact question, so far as I can find.

Senator LENROOT. I just asked as to the question, whether it was an open question with the Supreme Court of the United States?

Gen. CROWDER. It seems to be. If there are any questions I will be glad to answer. That finishes all that I have to say on the Bill of Rights.

I want to deal next with courts-martial as "executive agencies" and try to answer this question of whether we have any courts that are obeying orders of military commanders.

Senator WARREN. If you prefer to suspend now. General, if you want to leave town——

Gen. CROWDER. No; I prefer to go ahead. I will remain.

Senator WARREN. Then we shall take this up again to-morrow morning, and if I can get Senator Chamberlain here, I will do so. I think I am justified in saying that you would prefer to give your testimony when he is present?

Gen. CROWDER. Yes; I would much prefer that he should be here. I would like to have his interrogation on these points, because I shall shortly reach a stage where there are many disputed questions of fact.

(Thereupon, at 1 o'clock p. m., the subcommittee adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, October 25, 1919, at 10 o'clock a. m.)

ESTABLISHMENT OF MILITARY JUSTICE—PROPOSED AMENDMENT OF THE ARTICLES OF WAR.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 25, 1919.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to adjournment, in the room of the Committee on Appropriations, at 10.30 o'clock a. m., Senator Francis E. Warren presiding.

Present: Senators Warren (chairman) and Lenroot.

STATEMENT OF MAJ. GEN. ENOCH H. CROWDER—Resumed.

Gen. CROWDER. Gentlemen, I have a duty to perform to the American Bar Association, and particularly to the committee of that association charged with the investigation of military justice during the war, which it would have been more courteous to perform when I first appeared before this committee.

This committee admitted as relevant to the inquiry it is conducting a letter addressed by Gen. Ansell to Judge Page, president of the American Bar Association, on July 17, 1919, embodying his complaints against the committee of that association and its procedure (pp. 211-214), and there was considerable colloquy in the testimony respecting that letter, a part of which I wish to bring to your attention. This is an inquiry addressed to Gen. Ansell:

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Did you not, as a matter of fact, charge the committee itself with being a packed committee?

Mr. ANSELL. I did. (Record, p. 211.)

Gen. Ansell puts in his letter of accusation of July 17, 1919 (pp. 211, 212, 213, 214), and follows that by stating:

Two of the members were committed from the beginning to the other side, and had declared themselves, and they were chosen as the result, whether they knew it or not, of strenuous effort being made by the War Department to bolster up their cause. It is true. (P. 214.)

In the matter of expenses of witnesses called by that committee, Gen. Ansell in his letter to Mr. Page of July 17, 1919, made the following statements:

Of course, if the hearings were to be fair and impartial, the committee should have been equally desirous of hearing witnesses on both sides and should have, if possible, secured equal facilities for their appearance. * * * The committee did not ask the department, so far as I am advised, to direct any officer of the Army whose name was cited by me, to appear before it, and consequently any officer or other person whom I desired called in opposition to the system could appear only by taking leave, if he were entitled to leave, and at his own expense. (Letter to Mr. Page of July 7, 1919; p. 213.)

These matters * * * are nevertheless not only significant of the attitude of the committee and the department, but were very real obstacles to a fair presentation of the question as well. In my own case, having nothing of this world's goods and having expended already too much of my meagre salary in behalf of the advancement of the cause of military justice, it would have been a hardship for me to go to Chicago at my own expense. (Letter to Mr. Page of July 17, 1919; p. 214.)

In his testimony before this subcommittee, Gen. Ansell says further:

* * * I did suggest witnesses to the committee of the American Bar Association, but in their telegrams or letters sent out, about which some of the witnesses have told me, they put the cautionary statement, "We have no funds to pay for your attendance here, and if you do so you will do so at your own expense"; * * * Whatever respect anybody else may have for such a committee, I, for one, as long as I live, will not express any respect for any such committee (p. 214).

Answering Senator Chamberlain's question referring to the "uneasiness" which induced the Secretary of War to appoint a strictly military tribunal (the Kernan-O'Ryan-Ogden board), Gen. Ansell replied:

* * * It was thought—it was in the air—that this bar committee report might be unfavorable to the department. That was not so obvious to me, because two of the members were stacked, and the personnel had been picked; the committee had been hand picked and personally conducted by the department satellites (pp. 214-215).

Gen. Ansell's letter of July 17, 1919, to Mr. Page, president of the American Bar Association, embodied many other complaints against the committee of the American Bar Association appointed by him. Mr. Page referred the letter to Judge Gregory, president of the association committee appointed to investigate military justice.

I learned these facts, and inquiry was made of the secretary of the American Bar Association to know if Mr. Gregory had answered these charges. He said that he had no reply. You are aware that he resides in Baltimore, and the inquiry was made over the telephone. Further inquiry was made over the telephone of Col. Hinkley, likewise a member of that committee and a resident of Baltimore, who had not a copy of it.

I then caused inquiry to be made over the telephone of the next nearest member of that committee, Mr. Conboy, of New York, and he procured a copy of Mr. Gregory's reply, which he sent me.

Senator WARREN. His reply to whom?

Gen. CROWDER. To Mr. Page.

Senator WARREN. From Mr. Gregory to Mr. Page?

Gen. CROWDER. Yes, sir. I then telegraphed Mr. Gregory to know if it would be proper to put it in the record, and he wired back his permission, and in a letter he said that he had consulted Judge Page, of the American Bar Association, who agreed with him as to the propriety of putting in his reply to these charges, and I now offer it in the hope that it will be received and given the same prominence as was the accusation. I ought to say, before submitting it, that Mr. Gregory not only replies to complaints, but questions of personal veracity between himself and Gen. Ansell are discussed.

(The letter referred to is here printed in full in the record, as follows:

AUGUST 12, 1919.

HON. GEORGE T. PAGE.

President American Bar Association,

Federal Building, Chicago.

DEAR JUDGE: I duly received copy of letter of Gen. S. T. Ansell, to you, dated July 17, in which he protests and insists considerably as to the investigation made by the special committee on military justice of the Bar Association, appointed by you, and of which I was chairman.

the fitness and qualifications of the members of the committee are considered not to deem it proper to say anything. You appointed the committee. I am sure that any member of it sought that appointment. So far as I know, and believe, no one of them did.

The manner in which the committee discharged its duties. I can only say that my observation has extended the committee, made up as it was of busy men, did the best that it could to conduct a fair, and, so far as time admitted, thorough inquiry as to the subject of the administration of military justice in the Army. I doubt men who have reached the age of members of the committee have prejudices and preconceived notions, which can not be altogether laid aside, but as the action of the committee is concerned, I believe that it will be found everywhere to be fair and impartial in seeking information on this topic. That its members do not altogether agree is due probably to the inherent difficulties of this to say a few words as to the specific statements made by Gen. Ansell in this case. He is a man with a grievance. He feels that he has been unjustly treated by military authorities. As to that, the committee has made no investigation, and I am concerned, I have no knowledge as to whether this is so or not. I do say, however, that it seemed to me to be rather inconsistent with efficiency either in the Army or elsewhere to keep a man at the head of an important department who was continually complaining at everybody in that department and denouncing its methods publicly and persistently, and also criticizing with great severity, and, as it seems to me, with marked injustice, his official superiors. Gen. Ansell seems to have thought that this committee was constituted to try the great case of Ansell v.

the Army, and that as plaintiff he was entitled to take charge of his side of the case, to have it heard, and to prosecute it—the committee to act as a court. This was not the understanding of the committee. We did not propose to have Gen. Ansell take charge of the inquiry and run it, but we proposed to run it ourselves, in our own way, to give every opportunity to be heard and to have people that he thought should be brought before the committee, or their views presented, as they saw fit.

Gen. Ansell's first charge is that the committee immediately got in touch and contact with the Secretary of War, Chief of Staff, Judge Advocate General of the Army, and the Acting Judge Advocate General of the Army. Facts in this regard are known to Gen. Ansell, as I personally stated them to him, and they are largely correct. You never acted in this matter at all until you had seen Gen. Ansell and talked with him fully. You and I saw Gen. Crowder at Washington and had a long talk with him, I suppose of two hours, before the committee was appointed.
I have never seen him since, and I have no knowledge that any member of the committee has seen him since. I have never seen the Chief of Staff, and would not know him. Judge Bruce and I did confer with the Secretary of War once, and thence he dictated a letter to Brig. Gen. Kreger, Acting Judge Advocate General, requesting him to furnish the committee everything in the way of attendance lists and records, etc., that the committee asked for. Prior to this, the committee's invitation met Gen. Kreger at luncheon. As we were anxious to find out the methods obtained in the office of the Judge Advocate General, we had to get into communication with Gen. Crowder, thinking he might be back.

He was not, so we took the matter up with Gen. Kreger. We had no power to compel the attendance of witnesses, and the War Department could have frustrated any adequate inquiry had it seen fit to do so, by preventing the attendance of men in the military service. We were not familiar with the organization and personnel of the Judge Advocate General's office, and naturally sought to get that position of ascertaining what methods did obtain in that office before we proceeded to criticize. I think now and still think that this was the proper course to take.
Gen. Ansell states that it was known in the War Department, whether the committee knew it or not, that, while the committee was sitting in Washington, the military authority in the department said that they were ordering before the committee those who could give it the military view; that is, the departmental view.
The committee got little else. This is not the fact. In the first place, while Gen.
Ansell suggested the names of officers who were connected with the Judge Advocate Department, and one or two others, so that we might get at first hand the facts of the usual methods employed in that office, beyond this the selection of witnesses was made almost entirely by myself, and everyone that we asked to have before us was produced as a witness, except as in the case of Gen. Edwards, where it appeared to be some reason why this was not convenient or practicable.
The witnesses I think that appeared before the committee was a very excellent and distinguished officer—Col. Beverly A. Read. He was chief of the division of military justice in the Judge Advocate General's office, and Gen. Kreger suggested that we should call him. The great point which Gen. Ansell insists on is that there should be an appellate tribunal, not subject to military direction, with plenary authority over the action of general courts-martial, the judgments of which shall be binding and conclusive on the War Department, the President, and the rest of mankind, and that is the great point about which controversy has been raging in the War Department for perhaps over a year. Col. Read, being one of those witnesses selected by the authorities, according to Gen. Ansell, to establish that he was wrong, declared emphatically in favor of such a court. When I called his attention to the fact that Gen. Crowder took the contrary view, he promptly said, "I dissent," and said he had never seen Gen. Crowder's letter until that time, when I think I showed it to him. This all appears in the evidence. I may add that nearly all the witnesses who spoke on the subject recognized that excessive sentences had been imposed. Maj. Sanner referred to them as terrific. Col. Read said they were some of them grotesque—that this was not the way to enforce discipline; and numerous other witnesses and officers now in the service expressed the same opinion. So the statement that these men supported the existing system—referring to the witnesses whom we summoned in Washington—is absolutely unfounded, and if, as Gen. Ansell says, he has read the record, this statement is a gross impeachment either of his candor or his intelligence.

Third: Another absolutely unfounded statement made by Gen. Ansell is that: one could have believed the witnesses appearing before the committee, courts-martial were all but unknown in our Army. It appears by the testimony of Maj. Rigby before the committee that prior to the war, for a certain period of years, we had in the Regular Army an average of 4,600 general courts-martial a year, or 1 to every 30 men in the Army. Not only is this true, but it appears by the statement of Gen. Crowder in his letter of March 10 to the Secretary of War, which has been printed and given extensive circulation, that in the year ending June, 1917, in our Regular Army of 127,000 men, we had 6,200 trials by general courts-martial—practically 1 for every 20 men. Both of these facts are referred to in the minority report of the committee, and these facts appear in the evidence before the committee.

I may say, in addition, that very many witnesses, including, I think, Gen. Wood, deprecated the unnecessarily large number of court-martial trials in the Army. That the number was excessive and ridiculous, I think, was perfectly apparent from the testimony, and I must leave Gen. Ansell to explain what he means by the impudent statement that if one could have believed the witnesses appearing before the committee, such were all but unknown in our Army. It is a statement inspired by ignorance or mendacity, and absolutely without foundation.

Fourth: Gen. Ansell complains that the bill that he has drawn amending the Articles of War was subjected to prejudiced and uncomprehending criticism, and a hostile and uninformed analysis by Col. West, of the Judge Advocate General's office. He also states positively that the committee had it subjected to such analysis in that office. The latter statement is absolutely untrue. Col. West was summoned before the committee at Chicago. He had made quite a careful study of this bill, and he gave the committee the benefit of his criticisms. I did not agree with all of them, and do not now. I do not undertake to express any opinion of this bill as a whole, but I do say that in many respects the criticisms of Col. West seem to have some considerable foundation.

Fifth: Gen. Ansell says that many high ranking officers in the Regular Army appeared before the committee, and that on inquiry of several he finds that their appearance was regarded by the department as a military duty, and that appearing on duty in accordance with direction of the department, they received their pay and traveling allowances; that the committee did not ask the department, so far as he is advised, to direct any officer of the Army whose name was cited by him to appear before it, and consequently any officer or other person whom he desired called in opposition to the system could appear only by taking leave, if entitled, and at his own expense.

It is necessary to consider in this connection the facts as to our communication with Gen. Ansell. On Thursday, the 17th of April, at about 10 o'clock in the morning, all the committee then in Washington went from Gen. Kreger's office to that of Gen. Ansell. We invited him to appear before us, and as Judge Bynum had expected to go home that evening, and was very anxious to hear Gen. Ansell, he asked him if he could not go on that afternoon. He answered that he could not. We did not intend holding a session Friday, the 18th, and asked him if he could go on Saturday, but he indicated that he could not, and that he would prefer to go on Monday morning. This date he asked to have changed for Monday afternoon, and he appeared Monday afternoon and was heard before the committee for three days—something more, I think, than a third of the time that the committee was in session in Washington. When I saw him Thursday morning, the 17th, I told him that if there was anyone that he desired to have called to appear before us he should give us their names.

not, as stated by Gen. Ansell in this letter, then about to conclude our because we remained in Washington through the whole of the week following our hearings at 6 o'clock or after on Saturday evening, April 26. These names from Gen. Ansell on Friday, the 24th, just one week after I had that he give us these names. I wired all those living anywhere in the Washington on that date, asking them if they could appear before the committee in Washington on Friday or Saturday. Only one of them, Lieut. J. B. W. did so appear. We received statements from others, however, in writing, by Judge E. C. Raymond, of Newcastle, Wyo., Hon. Henry A. Wise, 111 West 12th Street, New York City, and W. T. Chantland, then with the Federal Trade Commission at Washington, and those statements are on file with the secretary as part of the record in this case. There were others also. On the 29th of April I addressed the gentlemen whose names had been given to us by Gen. Ansell, at the address that he had given, a letter in the following form:

"You are probably aware, a committee appointed by Judge George T. Page, of the American Bar Association, has been conducting an inquiry into the administration of military justice. In appearing before that committee, on the 24th of April, Lieut. Col. S. T. Ansell, at the conclusion of his statement, in response to questions from the committee, made a week beforehand that he do so, requested me to cite yourself, among others, to convey to the committee, in such way as you may prefer, your views upon this important topic.

"I am glad to receive them in writing, if you care to submit them. It is not probable, however, that the committee may hold some further sessions in this city before the next. If you think it likely that you would prefer to attend before the committee, and convey your views orally and will so advise me I will see that you are given the date and place of such session, if we have one."

"These letters were answered, some were not. None of the persons named, however, appeared before the committee at Chicago, though, as already indicated, several of them submitted their views in writing. There were a few that I addressed of the War Department, or The Adjutant General, and that I assumed their titles and their addresses were in the Army. These gentlemen made no reply whatever to my communications. Had they done so and indicated that they would attend I would have been glad to ask the necessary order from the War Department, as I did in other cases. Where they lived near New York I put in also a request that they might confer, if they preferred, with Mr. Conboy, who was vice president of the committee, as he lived in New York. I think there were only two gentlemen that Gen. Ansell named that were connected with the service; they were Eugene F. Ladd and Col. H. H. Sargent.

"When the committee met in Chicago I personally made special efforts to secure, and to insure, the attendance of a number of privates and noncommissioned officers as well as to get, so far as I could, their side of this controversy. I suppose these witnesses referred to by Gen. Ansell as "those pitifully few, and generally of low rank and humbler station in life, who expressed opposition to the system." I like to say to the General that before an American lawyer sitting in any kind of official capacity, if he is true to the ideals and standards of his profession, the poor corporal or humble private is just as audible as that of a major general with all the blazon of rank that a military tailor can equip him with. Whether he is enough of a lawyer to appreciate how true this is.

"Gen. Ansell admits that the committee notified him that they would hear him at Chicago, if he chose to appear, but says that the committee did not request the committee to send him to Chicago; his appearance, of course, would have had to be at his own time and at his own expense, and that he had already expended too much of his salary in behalf of the advancement of the cause of military justice, and it would have been a hardship to go to Chicago at his own expense. I take it from the reading of this statement, and having no other information on the subject, that the committee simply offered Gen. Ansell the right to be heard. As a matter of fact, what occurred was that on the 29th of April, when I wrote the letter to whom Gen. Ansell had requested that we summon, I wrote him a letter, in which I was writing to all these proposed witnesses, except Lieut. Gardner, who appeared before the committee, and giving him a copy of the letter. I concluded my letter with this paragraph:

"I also say for your information that it is not impossible that the committee will hold a session in this city on or before the 10th of June next; that if you desire to make some further statement on that occasion, I think the committee is disposed to allow you about half a day, and if it would facilitate your attendance, I think that the necessary orders detailing you for that purpose be issued by the proper authorities."

I am unable to see how a self-respecting man, mindful of what is due from an officer and a gentleman, can be guilty, in view of the plain facts, of making a statement such as that made by Gen. Ansell in regard to this incident. To that letter I never had the common courtesy of a reply.

I wish to say in conclusion that I endeavored to treat Gen. Ansell with great consideration. I publicly commended his efforts to secure reforms in the administration of military justice, and spoke highly of what he had done in that regard. He at once followed that up by a most impudent and insolent public attack upon the committee of such a character that we would have been justified in declining to hear a word from him, but out of regard for his somewhat overwrought condition, and assuming his sincerity and earnestness in a good cause, the committee ignored all this, although what he said did not go without rebuke, and listened to him for three days, and then offered to give him a further hearing, and to have him directed by the War Department to come here, so that he could get his pay and allowances, with the result that he has made the statement to you to which I have just referred. I write this not with any purpose of endeavoring to satisfy Gen. Ansell, because he has got himself into a state of mind and a state of exaggerated self-appreciation where nothing would satisfy him, except complete submission to his ideas; but I do wish to have you and the executive committee understand that your special committee endeavored to treat him considerately, to make a careful and absolutely impartial investigation upon this important subject, and to report honestly and fairly the conclusions of the members of the committee as a result of this investigation. So far as I am concerned personally, my own recommendations were so far in advance of Gen. Ansell that he could not agree to them, as he stated when he was before the committee. Therefore my withers are unwrung; but I can not understand how an officer and a gentleman who refers with apparent pride to his professional reputation and well-known record in the Army, can conduct a controversy in the manner in which Gen. Ansell has conducted the controversy with this committee, which he has himself created, after the most liberal and considerate treatment at the hands of this committee, and after they had ignored conduct of such grossly offensive character as was entirely sufficient to forfeit every right to consideration, or even to a hearing which Gen. Ansell might otherwise have had. I do not wish to magnify this matter, nor to make much out of nothing. The statements of this eminent lawyer and mighty warrior do not worry me in the least, but I propose to have the facts as they actually existed stated to you, so that they will be available to you and to the executive committee. Let the gallant general fret his little hour upon the stage—it will be brief—and let him extract all the satisfaction and glory he can out of it.

Yours, truly,

S. S. GREGORY.

I find I am in error as to Col. Sargent. He did reply, but said never having considered the subject he had no views to impart.

Gen. CROWDER. When the committee adjourned yesterday, we were discussing the nonapplicability of the Bill of Rights to military accused, and the extent to which Congress by special enactment had extended to military accused by statutory law the protection of the Bill of Rights. It occurs to me that I ought to connect up what I said there with the pending bill which you gentlemen are called upon to consider. You would expect that the pending bill prepared by Gen. Ansell would respect the theory as to the applicability of the Bill of Rights to military accused announced by him. But this bill does not secure to the accused, other than to one who is charged with a capital offense, the invariable benefit of the constitutional guarantee of being "confronted with the witnesses against him." (Sixth amendment.) Article 30 of the bill makes admissible in evidence against the accused, on trial for any noncapital offense before a special or summary court-martial or before a military commission, the depositions of witnesses taken at distant places to which the accused, as a practical matter, could not possibly go, and at which, in at least a large proportion of the cases, he would be unable to procure the services of counsel to cross-examine the witnesses for the prosecution.

It seeks, apparently, to justify depriving the accused of this right on the ground that it occurs only in trials for minor offenses.

But this explanation is not satisfying for two reasons:

First, an officer or soldier is triable under article 14 of the bill before a general court, and a soldier under article 15 before a summary court, for most serious, noncapital offenses known to the law; offenses which, if the case were tried before a general court, the latter would inflict a very serious punishment under the terms of the bill; namely, by imprisonment for 20 years (arts. 78, 79), or for 5 years (arts. 88, 92). It is true that a conviction for these very offenses in a special court could not result in more than six months' imprisonment and in a summary court could not result in more than one month's imprisonment. But a light sentence by a court competent to punish more severely, is slight comfort to a man of whose career is wrecked by the stigma of conviction of the equivalent of a grave felony. A military accused needs protection against conviction for such an offense, and if he is to have it as of constitutional right, how can he be denied it in a class of cases by statute law as provided in the pending bill? That depositions may, under the terms of the pending bill, be taken in evidence in disregard of the alleged constitutional safeguard is not alone in the class of cases already mentioned, but also in that class that may result in long-term imprisonment. For military commissions are among the tribunals in which depositions are admissible against the accused by the terms of article 30 of the Chamberlain bill; and military commissions are empowered by the bill not simply to convict on depositions for grave offenses ranging to serious felonies, but to inflict long-term sentences of imprisonment commensurate with such offenses. Before military commissions, depositions are admissible against the accused under the same conditions as in any noncapital case.

It is that the very bill which is before this committee does not support the theory of the applicability of the Bill of Rights, which is claimed by Gen. Ansell to be universally applicable to cases of military accused.

Now come to the third subject that I wish to talk about, courts-martial as executive agencies, and to answer the criticism under that head.

Take the following from Gen. Ansell's brief of December 11, 1896 of the hearings):

Gen. Ansell in a double-leaded heading in his work on military law says that a court-martial is 'not a part of the judiciary, but an agency of the executive department.'

beginning and the cause of the difficulty. * * * His text continues: 'Not belonging to the judicial branch of the Government, it follows that courts-martial do not pertain to the executive department; and they are in fact simply instruments of the executive power provided by Congress for the President as Commander-in-Chief to aid him in properly commanding the Army and Navy and enforcing discipline therein and utilized under his orders or those of his authorized military officers.'

The sequitur here is absolute and obvious. "Not belonging to the judicial branch of the Government," he says, then courts-martial must necessarily belong to the executive department. are merely instrumentalities of Executive power and operate under his orders. Since the days of Winthrop this has been the height of military logic, and we have all been steeped in the teachings that follow upon that fallacious syllogism.

Frequently throughout his testimony he recurs to this view of Winthrop and severely condemns it. On page 112 I find the following:

The ultra-military bureau chiefs of the War Department came to the support of the existing system, as they have ever done, with the slogan that the relationship between courts-martial and the power of military command for the enforcement of discipline must be conceded; that the courts can not be independent of the military command; that the law of the courts is the will of the military commander, and is subject to his judgment and discretion and his command.

And again on page 123, I find the following:

But Col. Winthrop was first a military man, and he accepted easily and advocated the view that courts-martial are not courts, but are simply the right hand of a military commander.

And, in his brief, he lays down that it was an inevitable corollary of Winthrop's doctrine that:

Being Executive agencies, they are subject to the power of command.

Adding that these teachings of Winthrop were all wrong, and that the sooner we abandon them the better (p. 124).

And then proceeds to announce the conclusion which he says follows logically upon the reasoning of Winthrop, namely: That courts-martial "are only agencies of military command, not courts of law." That "their proceedings are not regulated by law;" that "their findings are not judgments of law" (p. 103).

This general line of criticism runs through his whole argument. If there ever was a case of Don Quixote charging a windmill, we have it here. He misstates the doctrines laid down by Winthrop, and then proceeds to demolish his own man of straw.

Let us first deal with his unfairness to Winthrop. The excerpts from Winthrop first above quoted are taken from his chapter entitled: "The Court-Martial—Its History and Nature."

In this connection I wish to place upon your table the two volumes which constitute the life work of Winthrop, whom Gen. Ansell in another part of his testimony speaks of as the military Blackstone, and refers to his intellectual power.

A perusal of this chapter discloses to even the most casual reader that that illustrious text-writer, having in contemplation the scheme of Government of the United States with respect to its three coordinate branches, namely, the executive, judicial, and legislative, was seeking one of these branches into which he might place our system of courts-martial. It is equally apparent that Winthrop, as he was frequently wont to do, was discussing the particular subject more or less discursively.

It is inexplicably astounding that Gen. Ansell displays what appears to be a careful and studied discrimination in the selection of excerpts from the text, by quoting only those portions thereof which seem to support his criticisms and contentions, and by adroitly omitting those portions in which the author claims a judicial character and quality for the court-martial. Remarkable as it may seem in the light of Gen. Ansell's arraignment, Winthrop, in the same chapter denominates the court-martial as "A court of law and justice," and says:

Notwithstanding that the court-martial is only an instrumentality of the Executive power having no relation or connection in law with the judiciary establishments of the country, it is yet, so far as it is a court at all, and within its field of action, as fully a court of law and justice as is any civil tribunal. As a court of law it is bound, like any other court, by the fundamental principles of law and, in the absence of special provision on the subject in the military code, it observes in general the rules of evidence as adopted in the common-law courts. * * * In the words of the Attorney General courts-martial are—"In the strictest sense courts of justice" (pp. 61-62, vol. 1).

Again, in the same chapter and under the heading, "As Assimilated to a Civil Judge and Jury," the illustrious writer says:

As illustrating the function of a court-martial to administer law and justice, it may be noted that this court, though an "exceptional forum," is not without close analogies in its personnel to the ordinary civil tribunals. Thus it has been frequently compared, as to some of its powers and proceedings, to a judge and, as to others, to a jury. Indeed, in its taking of statutory oath, its being subject to challenge, its hearing and weighing of evidence, its findings of guilt or innocence, and its liability to be reassembled to reconsider its verdict, it nearly resembles a traverse jury in a criminal court. On the other hand, in its arraignment of the accused its entertaining of special pleas to its jurisdiction or competency as a court and objections to the sufficiency of the pleadings and the admission of testimony its authority to grant continuances and to adjourn, and its power to impose sentences, it is more clearly assimilated to the judge. The further comparison by Attorney General Cushing of a court-martial to a "grand jury" in that its members are "changeable in numbers and personality within certain limits," is a much less obvious analogy (pp. 62-63, vol. 1).

The foregoing significant quotations make it obvious that Winthrop did, in fact, ascribe to courts-martial those very qualities which Gen. Ansell claims that Winthrop and the Judge Advocate General deny to them, of functioning as judicial tribunals with a special and limited jurisdiction.

He is equally unfair in his statement of my own position, for in his letter of March 11, 1919, he says:

He [the Judge Advocate General] insists that courts-martial shall be subjected from beginning to end to the power of military command (p. 218 of these hearings).

What are the facts? Gen. Ansell had before him and was directly replying to my two letters of February 13, 1919, and March 8, 1919. In the former I express myself on the subject as follows:

* * * Although the theory of military justice does differ slightly from the theory of civil justice, yet in substance and in practice both of them, in our inherited Anglo-American system, are fundamentally identical, in that justice is founded upon and strictly limited by the requirements and safeguards of strict rules of law. * * * The contrast of theory between the two is well set forth in a statement of Gen. William T. Sherman, made 30 years ago, in discussing our Articles of War:

"The object of the civil law," he says, "is to secure to every human being in a community the maximum of liberty, security, and happiness consistent with the safety of all. The object of military law is to govern armies composed of strong men, so as to be capable of exercising the largest measure of force at the will of the Nation."

But once this difference of theory and purpose is conceded, the two systems proceed in identical methods, viz, by the application of strict rules and regulations so drawn as to give equal and fair treatment to all men, and to protect them against mere arbitrary discretion on the one hand and the inflexible rigor of automatic penalties on the other hand.

This system of military justice thus established is one of law and orderly procedure, not one of arbitrary discretion of the commanding officer. The proceedings are so conducted as to preserve for scrutiny of the superior authority every point of law which can possibly be raised for the protection of the accused. The accused is furnished a copy of the proceedings on request. This record goes up to the reviewing authority, and then to the Judge Advocate General. The Judge Advocate General's ruling on revision represents the application of all those legal principles which are required by the law and regulations to be observed—definition of offenses, organization of the court, due procedure, sufficiency of proof, limitations of penalty, and so on. And the judgment of the Judge Advocate General, embodying those principles, is practically enforced and put into effect by the commanding officers with virtually the same effect as the decision of an appellate civilian court. The picture drawn of an arbitrary commanding officer contemptuously ignoring the limitations of law as embodied in the opinion of the Judge Advocate General is incorrect. In justice to officers of the Army who have in the stress of war acted as convening authorities, it should be dismissed from the minds of the American people.

In my letter of March 8, 1919, I express myself on the subject as follows:

The system of courts, procedure, and defined offenses is one of law and order and not one of arbitrary discretion of the commanding officer. The proceedings follow the fundamentals of our criminal common law—the accused has his challenges; he may have process for his witnesses; he has counsel without cost, either selected by himself or assigned by the proper authority; he is not compelled to testify against himself; he is furnished a copy of the testimony and proceedings. The proceedings are so conducted as to preserve for scrutiny of a superior authority every point of law that can be raised for the protection of the accused.

Certainly there is nothing in these two excerpts from my letters, which constitute an expression of my views in the exact point of the controversy, that would justify Gen. Ansell in saying that I was of the view that courts-martial should be subjected from beginning to end to the power of military command.

“But Col. Winthrop was first a military man” (p. 123).

Here is a statement of the military service of William Winthrop, late of the United States Army, compiled from the records of The Adjutant General's office:

He served as a private of Company F, Seventh New York State Militia, from April 17 to June 3, 1861; first lieutenant, First United States Sharpshooters, October 1, 1861; captain, First United States Sharpshooters, September 22, 1862; honorably mustered out September 16, 1864; major and judge advocate of Volunteers, September 19, 1864; transferred to Permanent Establishment, February 25, 1867; major and judge advocate, United States Army, February 25, 1867; lieutenant colonel and deputy judge advocate general, July 5, 1884; colonel and assistant judge advocate general, January 3, 1895; retired, August 3, 1895; died, April 8, 1899.

Brevetted lieutenant colonel of Volunteers March 13, 1865, “for faithful and meritorious services in his department in the field,” and colonel of volunteers March 13, 1865, “for faithful and meritorious services in the field and in the Bureau of Military Justice.”

It is a career limited, so far as military service in the line is concerned; and a very extended and distinguished career so far as legal service in the legal department of the Army is concerned.

Senator WARREN. He served until 1864 in the line?

Gen. CROWDER. And after that in the Judge Advocate General's department.

Senator WARREN. Yes.

Gen. CROWDER. Now, if there is dictation by military authorities to courts-martial; if commanding generals do control their deliberations and their decisions, it ought to be evident in some specific act charged against them. I have tried to find from the testimony before this committee some arraignment of some military man for some arbitrary act in his relations with courts-martial convened by him. I have found one concrete charge of this character. Gen. Ansell says that in recommending clemency to the President and the subordinate commanders in General Order No. 7 cases “frequently we got very sharp retorts from them to the effect, ‘You had better mind your own business; we know what this requires.’” (p. 182. Hearings).

I have had a diligent search made of the records of the department to see what evidence there was of resistance by the President and department commanders to the recommendations of the Judge Advocate General, and especially for examples of the curt language which was attributed to them. Col. Rigby called your attention to the fact (p. 531, Hearings) that in all cases handled from October 1, 1917, to August 31, 1919, there were 28,463 cases examined and 275 returned to commanding officers, and there were 4 instances where the commanding officer refused to follow the advice of the Judge Advocate General for modification or disapproval of sentence on legal grounds. I have here two cases illustrative of the kind of so-called "sharp retorts" from commanding generals, alleged by Gen. Ansell. I brought them along with me in order that you might see just what kind of "sharp retort" there was in those two cases.

Gen. Arthur Murray, commanding the Western Department, at San Francisco, said in a letter of April 23, 1918, to the Judge Advocate General, as follows, with reference to one of those cases. It appears that it was a case where our office had recommended that the dishonorable discharge be suspended. The letter is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
HEADQUARTERS WESTERN DEPARTMENT,
San Francisco, April 23, 1918.

From: Commanding general.
To: Office of the Judge Advocate General.
Subject: United States v. James E. Meline (J. A. G., No. 112698).
Reference: Your letter of April 8, 1918.

1. Copies of the orders promulgating the case are inclosed.
2. In view of the fact that the prisoner, in case discharge is suspended, must be carried on the rolls of his organization as a soldier absent in confinement, for the term of his confinement, which in this case is 10 years; of the fact that under statutory authority the Secretary of War may restore the prisoner to duty when discharge has not been suspended to the same extent as when it has been suspended; of the fact that section 340 of the Court-Martial Manual states that the War Department policy there set forth carries no substantial mitigation as to other than peace deserters; and of the further fact that section 393 requires discriminating action on my part in passing upon sentences, I considered it proper exercise of discretion to omit suspension of the discharge in this case and I am still of such opinion.

ARTHUR MURRAY,
Major General Commanding.

Senator WARREN. Gen. Murray was formerly at the head of the Coast Artillery?

Gen. CROWDER. He was the Chief of Coast Artillery before he became a general of the line.

Senator LENROOT. Have you the recommendation of the Judge Advocate General's Office in that case?

Gen. CROWDER. I have not. It could be procured.

Senator LENROOT. Perhaps you could tell me, anyway: There was no recommendation as to remission of sentence?

Gen. CROWDER. Apparently none, because the order is not responsive to that. It is responsive to a recommendation that the dishonorable discharge be suspended.

Senator LENROOT. It was not based upon prejudicial error in the case?

Gen. CROWDER. No.

Senator LENROOT. It was a matter of disagreement as to the punishment, or what the punishment should be, and not a matter arising out of any errors in the trial?

Gen. CROWDER. No, sir.

Senator LENROOT. I think it might be well, if you can find the letter, to put it in.

Gen. CROWDER. I shall insert it at this point in the record:

APRIL 8, 1918

From: The Office of the Judge Advocate General.

To: The commanding general headquarters Western Department, San Francisco, Calif.

Subject: Record of trial in the case of Pvt. James E. Meline, Coast Artillery Corps, Eighth Company, San Francisco, Calif.

1. The record of trial in the case of the man named above has been examined in this office and found legally sufficient to sustain the findings and sentence of the court.

2. It is the opinion of this office, except in very rare and exceptional cases, whenever a soldier is sentenced to confinement in a disciplinary barracks, that it is best to suspend that portion of the sentence adjudging dishonorable discharge until the soldier's release from confinement, unless sooner ordered by competent authority, so that he may be saved to the colors in the event that his conduct while in confinement shall merit restoration to duty. It is thought that this case falls within the spirit of this policy.

3. The file number of the record of this case in the office of the Judge Advocate General is 112698. For convenience of reference and to facilitate attaching the published orders in this case, when received, to the record, please place the said number in brackets at the end of the published order, as follows: [J. A. G. O. 112698]

E. G. DAVIS,
*Lieutenant Colonel, Judge Advocate,
Assistant to the Judge Advocate General.*

Gen. CROWDER. The second letter from Gen. Murray bears the same date and is couched in practically identical language. I will insert that letter and the office letter to which it was a reply.

APRIL 8, 1918.

From: The Office of the Judge Advocate General.

To: The commanding general headquarters Western Department, San Francisco, Calif.

Subject: Record of trial in the case of Recruit Antonio Forcelini, Coast Artillery Corps, Fortieth Company, San Francisco, Calif., National Army.

ARTHUR MURRAY,
Major General, Commanding.

• LENROOT. Those letters you have are both from Gen.

CROWDER. Both from Gen. Murray.

Out of 182 cases submitted to the War Department with recommendations based on grounds of illegality, the Secretary of War effected to the recommendation of the Judge Advocate General in 166 cases, and disagreed with the Judge Advocate General in 16 that is the amount of resistance by the Secretary of War encountered by the Judge Advocate General between October 7, and August 31, 1919, on the recommendations that he made.

Secretary of War, I think, is prepared to speak on the question of difference of opinion. He told me when he consulted me about these cases I had nothing to do with those cases—that it was a matter of opinion as lawyers.

• WARREN. That was while you were serving as Provost Marshal General?

CROWDER. I was on duty as Provost Marshal General. I had nothing to do with the cases. The points of difference were not in any case of which I was in charge, or which I presented.

• LENROOT. What would you say of the cases where the recommendation was followed, in cases where it was based upon reversible error; did even the granting of the recommendation constitute justice?

CROWDER. I want to be sure I understand you.

• LENROOT. Would the granting of the recommendation be on the basis of a sentence or remission of whatever verdict there was?

CROWDER. It might be a disapproval of the findings of the court.

• LENROOT. It might be.

CROWDER. Yes, frequently; and it might be a disagreement between the court and the Judge Advocate General's Office as to approval of the sentence. In fact, it might happen, and it has happened, that it was a disapproval of both the findings and sentence.

• LENROOT. Then, can you tell me, where the Judge Advocate General's Office has made a recommendation based upon prejudice, whether in all cases where a recommendation has been made at all it has been a disapproval of the findings?

CROWDER. A disapproval of the findings — — —

• LENROOT. Wherever the Judge Advocate General's Office recommended a disapproval of findings, that recommendation was granted except in cases — — —

CROWDER. There are 10 cases, according to this table, to be taken up, and I can assume, for the purposes of this discussion, that all of them dealt with reversible prejudicial error. Let us assume that the record is, 10 instances of disagreement in a total of 457 cases turned over with the review of the Judge Advocate General, 4 of which have been by department commanders or reviewing authorities below, and 6 of which have been disagreements with the Secretary of War.

Senator LENROOT. Then let me ask you this as to the practice of the department. Whenever your department is of the opinion that prejudicial error has been committed, does it then recommend disapproval of the verdict--of the findings?

Gen. CROWDER. Oh, yes; when it is a reversible error; that is, affects the substantial rights of the accused. Since General Order No. 7 was issued, in January of 1918, we have reserved the power in the very terms of the approval of the commanding general below to reach out against the findings and the sentence in all cases involving death, dismissal, or dishonorable discharge, which are all the graver cases, and disapprove findings as well as sentences.

Senator LENROOT. How was it prior to that time?

Gen. CROWDER. Prior to that time the review of the reviewing authority below was final as to prejudicial error, but not as to jurisdictional error.

Senator LENROOT. And the other was merely a carrying out of the power of clemency?

Gen. CROWDER. Yes, sir. Before that, unless the error was jurisdictional, our only remedy was clemency; and I am glad you asked the question, because there ought not to be any doubt in anybody's mind about it. Prior to the issue of General Order No. 7, where the error was not jurisdictional, the finding of the authority below was final, and the only power which we had was constitutional pardon, or executive clemency.

I encounter another statement of Gen. Ansell's in his testimony, which is germane to this topic. He says:

The French punishments are comparatively very light indeed (p. 275).

He cites no authority for this statement and gives no statistics. It has been found impossible to get statistics from the French authorities covering the severity of sentences and the number of death sentences imposed during the war. The impression of American officers in touch with the French who have made inquiries on the subject is that the French habitually imposed heavy sentences during the war and that it is for that reason that the present government is not willing to give out statistics on the subject. Col. Rigby informs me that it has been authoritatively stated verbally, for instance, that approximately 1,600 death sentences were imposed during the war for the one offense alone of "misconduct in the face of the enemy," and that between 1,000 and 1,100 of these death sentences were actually carried into execution. That is the best information we can get on the subject.

But recurring to our problem, all the time there existed this power of clemency that could have been invoked at any time as against any excessive sentence. I find Gen. Ansell stating on page 186 of the record as follows:

The man who did institute the procedure (i. e., clemency) was myself, * * * a man who had had to fight to get such clemency as we had already. (Hearings, p. 186.)

There were cited on the floors of Congress, in debate, 6 cases of severity of sentence, and the country was asked to form an impression of court-martial procedure from what was said in regard to those

Three of them were sentences in which Gen. Ansell himself ed clemency. These cases are as follows:

No. 113076, Pvt. Walworth, 10 years' sentence for sleeping letter of Gen. Ansell, November 7, 1918, recommending leniency.

No. 115506, Pvt. Sabbri, 10 years' sentence for sleeping on ter of Gen. Ansell, November 22, 1918, recommending leniency.

No. 119328, Pvt. Robbins, 25-year sentence for desertion, without leave, and breaking arrest, letter of Gen. Ansell, or 8, 1918, recommending against clemency.

Walworth and Sabbri cases were among those cited by Senator Lamm in his speech in the Senate December 30, 1918, as duly severe; and the Robbins case was cited in the House representatives by Representative Burnett, February 19, 1919, as severe.

But, of course, that we will recur to these several topics later we get to discussing the pending bill, and I am not attempting the presentation at the present time, but to make a statement which will introduce the subject in such a way that inquiries and answers may be concrete.

As next to the subject of prejudicial error.

Mr. LENROOT. Do you intend to take up the case of these cases?

Mr. ROWDER. Yes. I intend to.

Gen. Ansell's statements to the committee on this subject of prejudicial error are as follows:

Under the practice of the War Department, as suggested at that time, the proceedings might contain errors of law that at least measured up to error if not annihilating error, it was the practice of the War Department to act accordingly, that notwithstanding such error it was not reviewable and therefore incurable. In other words, the War Department at that time held that proceedings, findings, and judgment of a court-martial are final beyond all curative power, when those proceedings and final judgment are once approved by the commanding general who brought that court into being, regardless of errors of law were committed in the proceedings; and that, conceding that was full of such errors, it could not be examined (p. 55) * * *.

the situation at the beginning of the war was and it is still largely the same that a court-martial judgment can not be modified by any power on earth to correct what prejudicial errors of law were committed in the proceedings. It is my proposition that the whole controversy if we can refer to it as a controversy I presume we may say revolves (p. 56).

Here in his testimony Gen. Ansell states:

Well, in any event, the situation when this war began was this: No matter what the judgment, it could not be reviewed (p. 99) * * *.

statements which I have read of Gen. Ansell illustrate the way that can be made of language the literal accuracy of which can not be disputed. He speaks of reversible error and leaves you puzzled in the view that that term "reversible error" describes a new class of error in civil jurisprudence as in military jurisprudence. He fails to remind you in this connection that the term "reversible error" in military jurisprudence is much more broadly defined than is the term as applied in civil jurisprudence. He fails to give you in this connection a distinction between the court-martial as a court of limited and limited jurisdiction and the civil court of general jurisdiction, in so far as this distinction affects the question of jurisdictional error. He fails to remind you that the court-martial is of the class of inferior courts of limited jurisdiction, and not on the same high ground with superior courts of record. (Ex parte Watkins, 3d Peters, 207.)

I am speaking now with citations to decisions of courts.

Jurisdiction generally: A court-martial organized under the laws of the United States is a court of special and limited jurisdiction. It is called into existence for a special purpose and to perform a particular duty. When the object of its creation has been accomplished, it is dissolved (3 Greenl. Ev., sec. 470; Brooks v. Adams, 11 Pick., 441, 442; Mills v. Martin, 19 Johns., 33; Duffield v. Smith, 3 S. and R. (Pa.), 590, 599).

To give effect to its sentences it must appear affirmatively and unequivocally that the court was legally constituted; that it has jurisdiction; that all the statutory regulations governing its proceedings had been complied with; and that its sentence was conformable to law. (Dynes v. Hoover, 20 How., 65, 80; Mills v. Martin, 19 Johns., 33.)

There are no presumptions in its favor, so far as these matters are concerned; and it is not enough that they may be inferred argumentatively. As to them, the rule announced by Chief Justice Marshall in Brown v. Keene, 8 Pet., 112, 115, in respect to averments of jurisdiction in the courts of the United States, applies. His language is: "The decisions of this court require that averment of jurisdiction shall be positive—that the declaration shall state expressly the fact on which jurisdiction depends. It is not sufficient that jurisdiction may be inferred, argumentatively, from its averments." All this is equally true of the proceedings of courts-martial. Their authority is statutory, and the statute under which they proceed must be followed throughout. The facts necessary to show their jurisdiction, and that their sentences were conformable to law, must be stated positively; and it is not enough that they may be inferred argumentatively. (Runkle v. U. S., 122 U. S., 543; 7 S. Ct., 1141; 30 U. S. (L. ed.), 1167. McClaughry v. Deming, 186 U. S., 49, 22 S. Ct., 786; 46 U. S. (L. ed.), 1049.)

A court-martial is wholly unlike a permanent court created by the Constitution or by a statute and presided over by one who has some color of authority although not in truth an officer de jure, and whose acts as a judge of such court may be valid where the public is concerned. The court exists even though the judge may be disqualified or not lawfully appointed or elected.

(See "Courts," vol. 7, Ruling Case Law, pp. 976, 999; "Judges," vol. 15, ib., pp. 519, 542.)

But the court-martial that has jurisdiction over any offense must, in the first place, be legally created and convened. Such a court is not a continuous one, created by the statute itself and filled from time to time by appointments of certain members under the power given by statute. This court has no continuous existence, but under the provisions of the statute it is called into being by the proper officer, who constitutes the court itself by the very act of appointing its members; and when he appoints as members of a court-martial persons whom the statute says he shall not appoint, the body thus convened is not a legal court-martial, and has no jurisdiction over either the subject matter of the charges or over the person of the accused. The act of constituting the court is inseparable from the act which details the officers to constitute it. It is one act, and the court can have no existence outside of and separate from the officers detailed to compose it. By the violation of the law the body lacks any statutory authority for its existence, and it lacks, therefore, all jurisdiction over the defendant or the subject matter of the charge against him.

It is a well-recognized principle of law as applicable to trials in the civil courts that where a court is without jurisdiction of the subject matter, such jurisdiction can not be conferred on the court by the consent of the parties. In such cases the question is not whether a competent court has obtained jurisdiction of a party triable before it, but whether the court itself is competent under any circumstances to adjudicate a claim against the defendant.

(See "Courts," vol. 7, Ruling Case Law, p. 1039.)

This principle applies with full force to a court-martial, and if such tribunal is convened in direct violation of statute, as where a court-martial under the former statute to try a volunteer officer was constituted of Regular Army officers, no consent on the part of the accused will give the court jurisdiction. The objection may be raised at any time and is not waived by a failure on the part of the accused to object thereto at the time of the trial.

Persons belonging to the Army and the Navy are not subject to illegal and irresponsible courts-martial when the law for convening them and directing their proceedings or organization and for trial have been disregarded. In such cases, everything which may be done is not merely voidable, but void (Dynes v. Hoover, 20 How., 65; 15 U. S. (L. ed.), 838), and civil courts have never failed upon a proper suit to give a party redress, who has been injured by a void process or void judgment of a court-martial. (Wise v. Withers, 3 Cranch, 331; 2 U. S. (L. ed.), 457. Dynes v. Hoover, 20 How., 65; 15 U. S. (L. ed.), 838.)

What is the application of all these opinions? I take it that it is this, that wherever a procedure has been violated—a statutory procedure—it becomes jurisdictional error. Take the case of a failure to give a man, Senator Lenroot, the full right of challenge. That would be prejudicial error in a civil court. It is jurisdictional error in a military court.

Senator LENROOT. That is because the statute specifically gives him that right.

Gen. CROWDER. Yes; wherever in such case there is a substantial right and that right is violated, it is jurisdictional error in a court of special limited jurisdiction.

Senator LENROOT. Yes; but let me put this case to you and get your view of it: Suppose in a trial there is admission of evidence of some other offense. That would not be permitted in civil courts, and in that case it would be treated as reversible error because of the probability that it would influence the minds of the court.

Gen. CROWDER. Yes.

Senator LENROOT. What would you say in this case?

Gen. CROWDER. That is prejudicial error.

Senator LENROOT. But not jurisdictional error?

Gen. CROWDER. Not jurisdictional. That is prejudicial error, against which we had no remedy until General Order No. 7.

Senator LENROOT. That is what I was getting at.

Gen. CROWDER. Yes. But, take the case of an insufficient charge—where no offense has been stated. I would classify that as jurisdictional error.

Senator LENROOT. Yes.

Gen. CROWDER. Take the case where the evidence failed to support the charge at all; where there was a failure of proof. I should say that error was jurisdictional. The man has not been tried. The line of demarcation between the two—jurisdictional and prejudicial error—is sometimes difficult to trace; but extreme liberality in classifying error as jurisdictional error, i. e., fatal to the validity of the trial, has always characterized our court-martial system. The point I want to make is this, that fatal error is much larger in the case of a court of special and limited jurisdiction than it is in the case of a court of general jurisdiction, where the law presumes so much in favor of the sufficiency of the record.

To show the classes of error which we have held as invalidating the record I will read here from a book, a military law textbook, under the heading entitled "Fatal Defects in the Record," for which the reviewing authority is to set aside the proceedings. I know that this book was written in the eighties; I know I am in disagreement with some of the statement; but it will show you how far the practice was carried in the direction of recognizing what is sometimes called prejudicial error, as error fatal to the validity of the trial. [Reading:]

1. Where the record does not contain a copy of the order appointing the court, or copies of all orders modifying the detail in any manner.

I think ordinarily the reviewing authority would take judicial notice of the orders that had issued at his own headquarters. [Continuing reading:]

2. Where the copy of the order in the record does not show by what officer the court was convened.

4. Where the record does not show that the court met pursuant to the order constituting it.

Where the record does not show that the court was organized as the law requires to state in the record, "The court being in session proceeded," etc., does not sufficiently set forth the organization.

Where the record does not show how many members were present each day and took part in the trial, or how many were present at a reassembling for revision.

Where the record does not show that the judge advocate was present during the trial.

Where the record does not show that the order convening the court was read in the presence of the accused or that he had opportunity of challenge afforded him, either to a member then sitting, or to one who subsequently took his seat.

Where the record does not show that the members of the court were severally duly sworn by the judge advocate in the presence of the accused.

Where it does not show that a member who subsequently took his seat was thus sworn.

Where the record does not show that the judge advocate was duly sworn by the president in the presence of the accused or that a new judge advocate who subsequently took his seat was similarly sworn.

Where the record does not contain a copy of the charges and specifications upon which the accused is tried.

the record does not show that the accused was allowed to plead, or shows he was tried without pleading to the merits, or does not contain his entire plea. The record shows that the accused was arraigned and pleaded prior to the opening of the court.

The record does not show that the witnesses were sworn.

Witnesses who were not sworn in the presence of the accused would not constitute a valid trial.

The record does not set forth the testimony of the witnesses.

The record is not sufficient to set forth a summary or such portion as the judge advocate requires. The full testimony of the witness in his own language should be set forth.

The record does not show that a clerk, or reporter, who recorded the proceedings of the court, was sworn to a performance of his duties.

The record does not show that an interpreter was so sworn.

If an interpreter was called to interpret the testimony of a single witness, and the record does not show that he was sworn, it would not be a fatal defect, provided there is sufficient evidence to convict without the testimony of this witness.

The record does not show that the court was closed for deliberation on findings and sentence.

There is a fatal variance between the name of the party in the specification and the finding or sentence.

In the case of a capital sentence, the concurrence thereon of two-thirds of the members of the court does not appear from the record.

The proceedings are not authenticated by the signature of both the president and the judge advocate.

The proceedings are not signed by the president of the court, and the court is not authorized to pronounce the sentence is wholly invalid, and the order approving it must be revoked.

The record of a trial by a military court is, furthermore, incomplete and insufficient if the reviewing officer fails to state his "decisions and orders" at the end of the trial.

And it is not sufficient to state such decisions, etc., at the end of a series of trials reviewed upon by the same reviewing officer; it must be stated independently of each case. To annex a copy of the general order promulgating the provisions of the law to a collection of records is not deemed a compliance with the law.

MR. WARREN. Has your manual anywhere in it that matter or matters?

MR. BROWDER. Not in the detail which is contained in this book. I am not going to read any more of this. The author (Ives) lists defects in the record calling for disapproval, which illustrates the liberality of the legal authorities of that day in finding fatal defects in the record. Instead of illustrating the harshness of military justice, it illustrates the extreme liberality in classifying as fatal errors of procedure leading to decrees of nullity.

It is fair to say that most of these are on the procedural side.

I want to give you the impression for a moment that prior to the issuance of General Order No. 7 we had any adequate remedy for prejudicial error in the admission or rejection of testimony.

MR. LENROOT. Let me ask you, in that connection: Prior to the issuance of General Order No. 7 was it the position of the department that there was no jurisdiction to issue such an order under the law?

MR. BROWDER. On the part of the President or superior authority?

MR. LENROOT. Yes.

MR. BROWDER. Prior to the revision of 1916; yes, out of deference to the doctrine laid down by Winthrop, who says (p. 687):

"and how far the proceedings and sentence, or any part of the same, shall be set aside, etc., is a subject wholly within the discretion of such officer (referring to the reviewing officer). As to this he is invested by the article with the sole authority, and can not therefore be directed either by the President or other superior. He is not to be governed by any known views of a superior as to any question of law or discretion."

cipline involved in the particular case, it is yet his duty, as it is his right, in the exercise of the power of approval or disapproval, to act according to his own best judgment and in the light of the facts and the law as understood and held by himself.

The legal sanction of G. O. 7 is found in new articles 37 and 38 of the revision of 1916. Since then we have had authority to issue such an order; but unquestionably the practice down to the beginning of this war was as laid down by Winthrop. I do not mean to say that the Winthrop doctrine had the concurrence of all military men. I have always felt that it was an open question whether this power did not inhere in the office of the President of the United States; and, even further, whether or not discipline was not an essential part of command, and that the President as Commander in Chief could exercise the appellate authority over these tribunals that was necessary to give effect to his own judgment respecting the findings and sentences of courts-martial. But I have always approached the subject with hesitation, because I believed it would take a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States to put the question at rest, and therefore when the necessity of this appellate power became manifest my first instinct was to come to Congress with a proposition to confer it upon the President, so that it would not be the subject of cavil or dispute.

I wish next to take up some inaccurate statements that have been submitted to the committee respecting the British court-martial system. I find on page 271 the following statement of Gen. Ansell:

Now, a field general court-martial is the general court-martial which accompanies the army when it is actually fighting in the field, for the trial of enlisted men—not officers. The law does not provide for this law officer with that court.

(Referring to the law officer who, under the British system, attends meetings of courts-martial and passes upon the admissibility of evidence.)

Senator WARREN. I will say, as you go along, that we have had Col. Rigby here, and he went very fully into the British system, etc., and he has had an opportunity to look over his notes, but unfortunately there was so much going on at the time on the floor of the Senate in which Senator Lenroot was interested that he was not able to be present much of the time. I say that as you go along so that you may elaborate a little more in what you are saying. I am telling you that so that you may remember to make your statement as full as you can, as you go along.

Gen. CROWDER. I so understood. To continue with what Gen. Ansell says [reading]:

The law does not provide for this law officer with that court; but the regulations have done so, and every field general court-martial for the trial of enlisted men for any offense, however slight—they do not try them for the slight offenses we do, however—has this law officer, and he is commissioned because his position is rather unstable, as you will see by reading this article and as I saw it (p. 271). (Italics supplied.)

The truth is that the British field general court tries officers as well as enlisted men without distinction.

The truth is that the "law officer," that is, the court-martial officer attached to the headquarters of the command, who is detailed as an additional "specially qualified member" of the court, does not attend every trial. On the contrary, he will be appointed to membership in every field general court organized within the command, but is not required nor expected to attend every session of every court of which he is a member. The regulation provides: "No case of a difficult, complicated, or serious nature should ever be tried without the attendance of one of such officers." (Circular Memorandum on Courts-Martial on Active Service, August, 1918, sec. 12-(b).) The convening authority determines which cases are so "difficult, complicated, or serious" as to require the attendance of the specially qualified member of the court.

Gen. Ansell says further:

We see that at the top of the (British) judicial hierarchy is a civilian, a barrister, answerable now to the secretary of state for war, and never to any military commander (p. 271).

Never any report of the judge advocate general of England goes to the commander in chief of the army or to any military commander (p. 271).

The authority that is actually exercised over him by the secretary of state for war is a formal one (p. 272).

The truth is, to the contrary, that the judge advocate general of England reports to the secretary of state for war through the deputy adjutant general (of the army council, the body corresponding to our General Staff), who carefully examines the record in each case and sometimes disagrees with the recommendation of the judge advocate general. The practice is substantially the same as that in this country, as appears from the signed statements of the British judge advocate general, and of Maj. Gen. Sir B. E. W. Childs, K. C. M. G., C. B., in evidence before this subcommittee, introduced by Lt. Col. Rigby.

Senator LENROOT. That has been the practice since general order No. 7?

Gen. CROWDER. Both before and since. But Gen. Ansell's proposition is largely to divorce the administration of military justice from the command of the Army. The English code has been cited as a precedent, and the facts have been inaccurately stated.

Now, passing to the French system, Gen. Ansell says as follows:

The French * * *. A man may not be court-martialed there until a quasi-judicial officer does look over the charges, and does look over the evidence to see whether there is a prima facie case (p. 275).

The truth is that, in the armies on active service, no preliminary investigation whatever is required, but the commanding general may, in his discretion, order any soldier or other military person before a court for trial, without any investigation whatever, by what is known as a "direct order," under article 156 of the Code de Justice Militaire.

Gen. Ansell further says:

Such officer is not under the control of military authority either (p. 275).

Again, the truth is to the exact contrary of Gen. Ansell's statement. The "rapporteur," whether in the territorial armies or in the armies in active service, is required to be an army officer and is appointed either by the minister of war or by the commanding general; and in the armies on active service he must be taken from among the officers serving in that command. (Code de Justice Militaire, arts 7, 9, 22, 34.)

Gen. Ansell says further:

The French * * *. And after the man is tried, as I have indicated, he gets this review (p. 275).

The clear inference of this statement, and of all of Gen. Ansell's other statements, in his testimony before the subcommittee about the French system, is that the right of review is secured to every soldier before their military courts, always.

The truth is quite to the contrary.

1. There is no automatic review, such as we have; and no review at all unless, within 24 hours, the convicted soldier formally prays an appeal. (Code de Justice Militaire, secs. 141, 143.)

2. The right of appeal may be wholly cut off at any time by presidential decree in time of war or of a state of siege, or by the commanding general of a place actually besieged (Code de Justice Militaire, art. 71), as was actually done several times during the war.

3. No appeal whatever was allowed from the emergency war courts ("special courts") established for the war under the presidential decree of September 6, 1914 (decree of Sept. 6, 1914, art. 6: "Guide Pratique et Sommaire," p. 72). These "special courts" were extensively used during the war until abolished in the spring of 1918.

4. In time of peace the appeal is to the court of cassation, instead of the court of revision. In such case the appeal must be prayed within three days from the date of judgment.

Our system has been held up to unfavorable comparison with the French system, which, as I have pointed out here, was lauded as a system in which a man gets a review. Whether or not he gets a review depends upon accident. It may be shut off altogether, and it may be shut off altogether by the commanding general in a besieged place; so that there is no rigid statute under which the French soldier gets a review.

Gen. Ansell, speaking still of the French Army, says:

My recollection of it is that, in time of war, they may have, and do have usually, on their court of military appeals men who are commissioned in the army; that is army men (p. 274).

Gen. Ansell's inference clearly is that the regular thing in the French Army is to have a military appellate tribunal composed normally of civilians, but that, in time of war only, it is permissible to have some military men on the court.

The truth is, to the contrary, that their courts of revision (which are their military appellate tribunals) are required by law to be, in every case, composed either wholly of military men or else predominatingly of military men. Their statutes require (a) in the armies on active service, or in a "state of siege," the court of revision shall be composed wholly of officers of the army, namely, of a brigadier general, two colonels or lieutenant colonels, and two majors (C. J. M., art. 40); and (b) that in the territorial armies—that is, in armies not in active service—three out of five judges of the court of revision must be army officers, the other two being civilian judges (judges of the civil court of appeals) (C. J. M., art. 27).

But in the zone of operations the moment war breaks out they wipe out even a minority civilian representation upon their court of appeals, and make it exclusively a military court; and even then give the President of France the right to shut off all appeals.

Senator WARREN. Somewhere, as you pass along, there is in this bill 64 a proposition of using enlisted men in courts-martial, and I think of one place they argue that in one or more of the countries abroad they have that custom; and sometime, in your evidence, you might touch upon that.

Gen. CROWDER. I will come to that in treating of the bill.

I wish to speak now of the use of prerogative writs in England, and the corrective use that is made of them over findings and sentence of a court-martial. Gen. Ansell says:

It is a remarkable fact that the courts-martial of England are subject to review by the civil courts, not only by way of the writ of habeas corpus but by writ of certiorari, by the writ of prohibition, and by the other common-law remedies; the relation of military justice to the civil judicial authority there is such as to permit that course (p. 125).

Here again you have a picture of an irresponsible military judiciary in this country operating independent of the civil courts, to an extent, at least, greater than is permitted under the English system. I propose to show that Gen. Ansell is wrong.

This statement of Gen. Ansell clearly infers that the British civil courts exercise a broader supervisory power over judgments of courts-martial than do the civil courts of the United States.

The truth is, on the contrary, that the rule as to the right of civil courts to interfere with the proceedings or judgments of courts-martial is precisely the same in the two countries. The rule in the United States, as laid down by the Supreme Court in one of the cases relied upon by Gen. Ansell in his testimony before this subcommittee (page 125), is that a civil court has no power to review the proceedings of a court-martial, "except for the purpose of ascertaining whether the military court had jurisdiction of the person and the subject matter, and whether, though having such jurisdiction, it has exceeded its powers in the sentence pronounced." (Carter v. Roberts, 177 U. S., 496, 498.)

That was the famous case of Capt. Carter of the Engineer Corps.

Senator WARREN. That was in a case of the embezzlement of funds?

Gen. CROWDER. Yes, sir. Now, the point is this, that precisely the same rule is laid down in the British Manual of Military Law in the following language:

The members of courts-martial and officers in the exercise of individual authority are * * * amenable to the superior civil courts for injury caused to any person by acts done either without jurisdiction or in excess of jurisdiction—

Almost the exact language of our own Supreme Court. Then the regulation continues:

Although there is not, in the ordinary sense of the word, any appeal from the decision of a court-martial or from the order of an officer. (British Manual of Military Law, Ed. 1914; Ch. VIII, sec. 1, p. 120.)

The writ of prohibition is available for the same purposes in this country in the same way and subject to the same limitations as in England, except only that a question has been raised as to whether our Federal courts have power, under the statutes of Congress under which those courts are organized, to grant the common-law writ of prohibition; but it has never been decided that they have not such power; and on the contrary in the cases where the question has been raised it was assumed by the courts for the purposes of the decision that the power did exist (Smith v. Whitney, 116 U. S., 167, 175–176; U. S. v. Maney, 61 Fed., 140). But the courts of superior jurisdiction of the several States of the Union have precisely the same inherent power as the superior courts of England to issue this writ (Smith v. Whitney, supra; 116 U. S., 167, 176; State v. Wakely, 2 Nott & McCord, 410; State v. Stevens, 2 McCord, 32; Washburn v. Phillips, 2 Met. (Mass.). 296). And in discussing the conditions upon which the writ of prohibition will issue against a court-martial, the United States Supreme Court cites and relies upon the decisions of English courts as stating the rule (Smith v. Whitney, supra, 116 U. S., 167, 176-179, 182-186).

Now, if there is a single question which can be raised in England by certiorari or habeas corpus or prohibition, which can not be raised by the use of corresponding writs in this country, I do not know what it is. I would like to have cited one single instance where the remedy in the United States procedure has been less comprehensive than it is in England. The English system has been mentioned as something sui generis, having no counterpart in any other country. That has been one of the arguments against our system, that it is not under the usual supervision of civil courts.

Senator LENROOT. Let me see if I follow you. In England, take the case of a conviction without jurisdiction. Does any writ of the civil courts apply?

Gen. CROWDER. Of course, the writ of habeas corpus would lie, and probably a writ of prohibition would lie during the progress of the trial.

Senator LENROOT. Yes, but after——

Gen. CROWDER. And a writ of certiorari might run to the court-martial to certify up the record and the questions.

An attempted use of the writ of prohibition issuing out of a United States court to a court-martial is found in the case of the United States v. Maney. I happened to be stationed at Omaha at the time. Maney, a lieutenant of the Fifteenth Infantry, had shot and killed Capt. Hedler. He had been tried in the United States court at Chicago for manslaughter, and had been acquitted. Charges were brought against him, military charges, for the same act of manslaughter, alleged as conduct to the prejudice of good order and military discipline under the sixty-second, the general, article of war. The court was convened at Fort Snelling. I was interested in those matters at the time, and took the trip up there to observe the progress of the trial. The accused, through counsel, Frank P. Blair, came before the court and made a plea in bar of trial, alleging that the court was without jurisdiction to try him because he had been previously in jeopardy. The court overruled the plea. Counsel applied to Judge Caldwell for a writ of prohibition, but he declined to issue it. Finally counsel obtained the writ from Judge Nelson, and the case was argued before Judge Nelson. In his reported decision, he referred to the fact that the authorities were somewhat confused as to whether or not a United States court could issue the common-law writ of prohibition, but he said he would concede that the writ would issue for the purpose of examining whether it ought to issue in this case, and then pointed out what is familiar law, but was apparently not familiar to these officers, that a plea of former jeopardy does not raise any jurisdictional question; but is a matter of defense which the court-martial has jurisdiction to pass upon and, having determined it adversely to the accused, was at liberty to proceed with the trial.

tor LENROOT. Would not the same thing have followed if the had not determined it, if it found that it had jurisdiction to fine it; if it had not made that finding?

CROWDER. In that case the court had decided that it had no jurisdiction. Would the prohibition have then gone to it?

tor LENROOT. No; if the writ had been asked for a military and the court-martial had not ruled on that subject, would not the same have been the same under the theory that they had jurisdiction so to find?

CROWDER. Yes; the ruling would have been the same. There is no doubt, in my opinion, that if a man has been put in custody without a writ, and no writ will issue in his behalf, when some writ will not issue in his behalf. If any restraint is applied, the writ of habeas corpus would be the moment that charges have been preferred it seems to me the writ of prohibition would lie, either against the court or the preferring officer, providing the common law writ of prohibition can issue out of a Federal court.

tor LENROOT. Have we ever had any cases other than of the writ of habeas corpus remedy, in the Supreme Court?

CROWDER. It has been attempted in two cases, one, the case of Whitney v. Whitney when Mr. Whitney was in the Cabinet, and in that case a writ of prohibition was sued out of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia against Mr. Whitney as Secretary of the Navy, and a naval court-martial convened by his order, to prohibit consideration or revision of the proceedings of the court-martial had been returned to it for that purpose by the Secretary of the Navy. The Supreme Court of the District of Columbia dismissed the petition for want of jurisdiction. On appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, the latter court raised the question of the power of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, and other courts organized under the laws of the National Government, to entertain writs of prohibition; but avoided a decision on the question, saying:

We are not inclined in the present case either to assert or to deny the existence of the writ, because upon settled principles, assuming the power to exist, no case is presented for the exercise of it. In deciding the case upon the facts before us, and expressing no opinion upon the broader question, because the determination of the case does not require it, we take the same course that has been followed by eminent judges in disposing of applications for writs of prohibition under similar circumstances (pp. 175-176).

The court held that the writ could not issue against the Secretary of the Navy, and then proceeded to discuss the question whether, upon the merits of that case, it should issue against the court-martial. It held, upon the merits of the case, that the writ ought not to issue, citing and relying upon English decisions relating to writs of prohibition against courts-martial. In other words, the United States Supreme Court in that case applied the same principles of law which have been laid down by British courts in like cases. (Smith v. Whitney, 116 U. S., 167, 175-176, 176-186.)

There was also this case of United States v. Maney, to which I called your attention. They are the only two cases I know of. There is no restraint that can not be reached by some writ, and all courts will review for lack of jurisdiction or for excess of jurisdiction, which is the sole power of the British courts. The British may employ more writs than we habitually do, but the military courts-martial of the United States are under the same accountability to the civil courts of the United States as are their courts-martial to the courts of England.

I come now in natural order to the November briefs. These briefs were directed to the existence of appellate power in the Judge Advocate General. Senator Chamberlain concurs in the view that Gen. Ansell expressed, that section 1199 of the Revised Statutes confers that appellate power and, in the course of his speech on August 20, said:

The Judge Advocate General had the power, if he had seen fit to use it, without any additional legislation to modify or to revise sentences of courts-martial, notwithstanding his present opinion to the contrary. (Cong. Rec., Aug. 20, p. 4338.)

And again:

might, if he had seen fit, have alleviated the suffering and humiliation that fell to the lot of thousands of American boys. (Cong. Rec., Aug. 20, p. 4339.)

In language like this, it has been sought to convey the impression to the country that the construction adopted by the War Department was a narrow, technical one, and that we were at liberty, had we seen fit, to have exercised an appellate jurisdiction under the existing law.

Much emphasis has been placed upon the fact that 17 civilian lawyers of repute, on duty in the Judge Advocate General's office, concurred with Gen. Ansell in his construction of this statute.

It is proper to invite the attention of the committee—

(1) To the fact that 2 of the 17 lawyers concurring in the brief of Gen. Ansell have subsequently appeared before the Senate Military Committee and withdrawn that concurrence. I believe if all were summoned here that all except two would similarly withdraw their concurrence.

(2) That the Bar Association committee, appointed to examine into this case, have expressed their unanimous nonconcurrence in Gen. Ansell's construction. (See p. 20 of the report of the American Bar Association committee.)

(3) That Maj. Runcie, one of the critics, and lined up generally with the two other critics, has likewise expressed his nonconcurrence in the brief of Gen. Ansell (p. 31 of Maj. Runcie's testimony before the Senate Military Committee.)

I propose now, briefly, to review the opinion rendered and show how impossible it was for any man who had given proper study to the legal questions involved to have reached a conclusion that section 1199 Revised Statutes did confer any appellate power upon the Judge Advocate General.

Gen. Ansell says that when he was conducting these studies and conferences with the 17 officers on section 1199, Revised Statutes, I visited the office one day, and that we engaged in a conversation, he and I, in an adjoining room, and that he told me of the study that the office was prosecuting and its probable result, namely that they would agree that appellate power of the Judge Advocate General could be deduced from that section; and that I told him to go to it, and put it across; but that he might have some difficulty with military men under article 37. (Hearings, p. 220.)

I do not recall that conversation, but I seem to recall that at another time the question of whether appellate power could be found in the Judge Advocate General came up for discussion, and a part of the language he attributes to me is language I am afraid I habitually use, namely "go to it," and "put it across"; but I know the processes of my own mind, and I know that I assumed that the sense of duty and obligation that induced Gen. Ansell to communicate to me the fact that the study was in progress, would have led him to communicate to me the results of that study before he undertook to act upon it. I never knew that he had submitted a conclusion to the Secretary of War until November 23, 1917. The date on his brief announcing his conclusion and the concurrence of these 17 officers is November 10.

On November 23 the Secretary of War sent for me and we had a conversation in his office—not in a room in the Army and Navy Club, as Gen. Ansell states. I remember the conversation well enough to be entirely accurate in presenting it, although I can not attribute to the Secretary his exact language, nor probably repeat my own, so that it could be put in quotation marks, but there will be no error of substance. The Secretary asked me how long I had been Judge Advocate General. I answered "A little over six years." The next question was, "Why have you not advised me of the existence of an appellate power in the Judge Advocate General to reverse, modify, or affirm sentences of courts-martial?" I replied that had never been the view; that no Judge Advocate General has ever expressed such a view; that one Judge Advocate General had taken the contrary view; and the department has followed that opinion; that I had followed it, as my immediate predecessor, Gen. Davis, had followed it. He said that Gen. Ansell had placed in his hands a very powerful brief on the subject which had challenged his attention, and asked me if I would take it and give it some study. I told him I would be very glad to do so. He asked me to submit my own views, and at the end of four days, on November 27, I submitted a reply brief. I want to discuss it briefly. Gen. Ansell argued for the existence of this power upon five principal propositions.

His first proposition was that the Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States had deduced an appellate power to modify or reverse in bankruptcy cases from the single word "revise" in a statute substantially similar to section 1199, Revised Statutes.

His second proposition was—I may not state them in their exact order—that the legislative history of section 1199 of the Revised Statutes supported his construction.

His third proposition was that all Judge Advocates General had acted upon that view until the days of Lieber, who, in an ill-considered opinion, had reversed the practice of the War Department.

His fourth proposition was that no civil court or other civil authority of the United States had ever questioned the existence of the appellate power he contended for.

His fifth and final proposition was that the British judge advocate general exercised this power.

Anyone accepting those five propositions of Gen. Ansell would have proceeded with him to his conclusion. My attention was especially challenged to his proposition No. 1, that the United States Court of Appeals had deduced this appellate power in bankruptcy cases from the single word "revise" in a provision of law which was substantially identical with section 1199 of the Revised Statutes.

What was my surprise to find out that Gen. Ansell had not brought to the attention of the Secretary of War a previous paragraph in the section which he was discussing, and which conferred the appellate power in express terms. The court, In re Cole, 163 Fed., 180, 181—the case relied upon by Gen. Ansell in his brief, on this point (hearings, p. 59)—was not deducing appellate power, because that had been given in express terms. The Secretary of War had no information from Gen. Ansell's brief that the statute from which he was arguing—the concealed part of it—conveyed appellate power in express terms, and that all the court was trying to do in re Cole was to deduce from the word "revise" in the second paragraph, the power, the collateral power, which would enable it to inform itself of the scope of matters that could be inquired into upon the petition in bankruptcy cases. So that his proposition No. 1 fell of its own weight.

I examined the history of the legislation, section 1199 of the Revised Statutes, in Congress, and my conclusion was, what I think yours must necessarily be, that it does not furnish any suggestion of an interpretation such as Gen. Ansell advanced.

As to his proposition No. 3, that Judge Advocates General prior to Lieber had held that this power existed, I found there was no proof of it from the records, after the examination of a great many cases; and even to-day, with all of the publicity that has been given to this, nobody has ever been able to point to a single case in which any Judge Advocate General ever sought to exercise this power.

Judge Advocate General Holt had not. He was the first Judge Advocate General we ever had, and remained in office from 1862 to 1877. Before becoming Judge Advocate General he was, as you know, Secretary of War. He was one of the distinguished jurists of this country. He is the father of our military jurisprudence. He never claimed that the power existed. He never exercised the power. So that we have to part company with proposition No. 3.

Proposition No. 4 was that no civil court of the United States, or other authority, had ever ruled on this question; when, as a matter of fact, in the case of Ex parte Mason, the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of New York had ruled upon the precise question, and held that the power could not be deduced from section 1199.

Senator LENROOT. What case is that?

Gen. CROWDER. The case of Ex parte Mason, the sergeant who shot at Guiteau. These things I am not going into in greater detail because they are all in my opinion.

Proposition No. 5 was that the British judge advocate general exercised this power. We all know that that is not true. That is conceded now. You do not have to deal with it.

So that all five propositions from which Gen. Ansell argued in his November 10 brief were misleading propositions, to put it mildly; and as I say, two of the officers who concurred with him, when the facts were laid before them, and they subsequently appeared before this committee, have, I believe, withdrawn their concurrence. What the other 15 would do if they had an opportunity is a question, but I do not see how they could reasonably avoid a similar course. Certain of them I have talked to, and they have told me they acted without inquiry or question upon these five propositions of Gen.

Ansell. With such an attitude, of course, they must proceed with him to a conclusion.

Now, further, we have the concurrence of the Secretary of War as a lawyer upon this construction, we have the concurrence of the Bar Association Committee, and we have an undisturbed pronouncement of the Federal courts upon this subject. Is it any longer a question that we could have exercised this power if we had chosen to do so? I will jump as many hurdles, and as high, as anyone, to deduce a power to meet an emergency; but I do not propose to jump any hurdles when it comes to assuming a jurisdiction in a judicial procedure.

Immediately upon turning in that opinion we commenced to look around for an available means to get this power, because Gen. Ansell had certainly demonstrated that it was a necessary power in this World War. However well we may have gotten along without it before, it was a necessary power with 4,000,000 men in the field with new officers. I said to the Secretary of War, in concluding my opinion, "that I would try to find it by construction in the President of the United States under his constitutional authority to command the Army, but that it would be a difficult and prolonged study."

In the meantime I asked him to do immediate justice, as nearly as he could do justice, to the enlisted men in the Texas mutiny cases, which were the occasion of the presenting of this brief, by ordering an honorable restoration to duty in all those cases. The cases of those enlisted men I will insert in this connection, if I may. The point I wish to make is this, that Gen. Ansell has represented to this committee that they were reenlisted, and they lost their continuous service status and their continuous service pay because they were under the necessity of reenlisting. My memorandum, when submitted, will show that on the contrary they were restored to duty under the statute to which I called your attention yesterday, and that they did not lose, upon restoration, either their continuous service status, or their continuous service pay. This information I got direct from the finance department.

Senator LENROOT. Now, you restored them to all their rights and privileges as if that had not happened?

Gen. CROWDER. All the rights; and except that they had been subjected during that period to confinement, everything was as if it had not happened. It was not a complete remedy. Let us admit that. It, however, did restore them to their original status, except that one of them, I think, lost his rank. He went back as a private. He had gone out as a sergeant. The noncommissioned officers went back as privates. Whether they speedily regained their rank I do not know.

Senator WARREN. Was that one the only noncommissioned officer?

Gen. CROWDER. I do not remember; but I can say this, Gen. Ansell referred to them as men of 15 to 20 years' service. As a matter of fact, they were all in their first enlistment, I think, except one. My memorandum, when I discover it, will show all the facts.

Senator WARREN. That will contain all these particulars, will it?

Gen. CROWDER. Yes, sir.

Senator WARREN. I would like to know if there was more than one. You say one was reduced. We have heard that these men were all old in the service, and we were told that the effect of this action was to reduce these men, to take their stripes off; in other words to reduce them to the ranks.

Gen. CROWDER. Of course that resulted from a dishonorable discharge.

I have talked here without notes and without reference to the information. This seems to be a matter upon which a great deal depends. I would like to be subjected to cross-examination upon section 1199, if it is still an open question. I do not know of anyone who has studied the authorities who adheres to the position that appellate power can be deduced from section 1199; nor do I think. although my opinion on that subject is of course not very valuable. that if the proposition was before Congress to-day to vest in the Judge Advocate General of the Army this appellate power, to reverse, modify or affirm, in a way, to conclude the President of the United States, the commanding general of the Expeditionary Forces and all commanding generals under him, it would command very many votes in either House. And I say to you this: Give the Judge Advocate General that power, and I care not whom the people may elect President of the United States or whom that President appoints as commanding general of the Army, the Judge Advocate General will administer the discipline. There will be no question about that.

Senator LENROOT. I think that would be true under the broad powers. But supposing that that power so revised was limited to revision for jurisdictional defects or prejudicial errors of law: you would not make that statement as broad, then, would you?

Gen. CROWDER. The difficulty would always be in determining what is a question of law, and I am going to bring out that difficulty as plainly as it can be brought out when I proceed with my next topic, actually to try out the application of the pending bill to a military case. That is my next subject.

Senator LENROOT. Now, to drop that, I would like to ask you, General, with reference to the General Order No. 7 and the power that you did find to be vested in the President. Upon what did you base that?

Gen. CROWDER. Of course it was manifestly opposed to the doctrine I read to you from Winthrop.

Senator LENROOT. Certainly.

Gen. CROWDER. We deduced it out of Articles of War 37 and 38 of the existing code, new articles of the Revision of 1916, and also out of the exigencies of the case as a step we must take at once awaiting the grant of appellate power from the Congress of the United States. All we said to the lower authorities was in the nature of a rule of procedure under article 38, viz: "Suspend your action, until we can pass upon the case." All we did after we passed upon the case was to address their discretion. We did not ourselves exercise the appellate power. And it seems to me that in every case where we addressed their discretion on the question of prejudicial error there was acquiescence, except in a limited number of cases to some of which I have called your attention. This may not be entirely accurate, but it is substantially accurate. In effect, we got the results of an appellate jurisdiction; but, as I say, we had the right to command them not to take final action in the case. That was unquestionably the right of the President under new article 38 of the 1916 revision.

and we had a right to address the discretion of reviewing authorities below, as to what their final orders should be, until its modification, General Order No. 84, laying down a rule for the branch offices in France, came along and directed the reviewing authorities in France, to comply with the recommendations of the Acting Judge Advocate General in France. Then the question of full appellate power was boldly presented. That was the order that was finally canceled, that was issued without full appreciation by the War Department of what it was intended to accomplish. In other words, it established the appellate jurisdiction in France, while withholding it here. I hope I make that plain.

Senator LENROOT. Yes.

Senator WARREN. Gen. Bethel was the superior over there, was he not?

Gen. CROWDER. No; Gen. Bethel was on duty with Gen. Pershing. The branch office in France was under Gen. Kreger.

Senator WARREN. Gen. Kreger was not there all the time. Who was, then?

Gen. CROWDER. Gen. Kreger was there from the time it became effectual. Gen. Bethel was there waiting for Gen. Kreger to arrive; and Gen. Kreger, when he was there, represented the Judge Advocate General over there.

Senator WARREN. Gen. Bethel was the judge advocate general of the American Expeditionary Forces there, with office in the field?

Gen. CROWDER. Yes, sir. After General Order No. 84 was issued, and until it was revoked, the acting judge advocate general in France was supposed to be vested with authority to control the discretion of reviewing authorities and convening authorities of the expeditionary forces, including Gen. Pershing.

Senator WARREN. Was there an incident something like this, after Kreger had gone there and established himself—of course I did not ask this when he appeared before us; it came up in another way—that he was brought home with the intention, at the time, of his not going back; either to discontinue the kind of service that he was there doing, or to put somebody else in his place; do you know?

Gen. CROWDER. Kreger?

Senator WARREN. Yes; Kreger.

Gen. CROWDER. I do not connect up with that thought, at all.

Senator WARREN. His service over there was continuous from first to last?

Gen. CROWDER. It was. He had a successor in office when he was drawn back here to take my place in the office when I was ordered to Cuba.

Senator WARREN. It was continuous over there, was it?

Gen. CROWDER. The office continued to function over there under Col. White, after Kreger left, and went on for some time. First they issued an order to discontinue it, but Gen. Pershing sent us some telegrams from his department, all indicating that it would be a matter of embarrassment if it were discontinued, and Col. White continued.

Senator WARREN. That is what I wanted to know, whether there was considered at the time the discontinuance of this office in the service over there?

Gen. CROWDER. Yes.

Senator LENROOT. When this General Order No. 7 was issued, was this the situation, that although the commander in chief formally disapproved of findings of a court-martial, nevertheless that finding could be ignored, and to that extent the subordinate was superior to his chief?

Gen. CROWDER. That finding could be ignored?

Senator LENROOT. Yes; disapproved.

Gen. CROWDER. By whom?

Senator LENROOT. By the commanding officer creating the court: the final power?

Gen. CROWDER. There was but one reviewing officer prior to General Order No. 7.

Senator LENROOT. Yes.

Gen. CROWDER. That was the convening authority.

Senator LENROOT. Yes. Now, the President reviews, under General Order No. 7?

Gen. CROWDER. No; under General Order No. 7 we review the case and return it to the convening authority.

Senator LENROOT. Yes.

Gen. CROWDER. And he issues the order in accordance with our opinion.

Senator LENROOT. I thought you said, if I understood you, that you found that there was in the President this right.

Gen. CROWDER. I found that there was in the President the right to issue an order to the reviewing authority below not to make his action final, but to send up the case in such a form as that it would give an opportunity for review here and recommendation to the convening authority.

Senator LENROOT. In other words, to suspend his action?

Gen. CROWDER. To suspend it, pro tanto, until we had reviewed and reached a conclusion and communicated that conclusion to the convening authority.

Senator LENROOT. Then after all, the only effect that had, legally, was to suspend the action, beyond that which the practice had been theretofore?

Gen. CROWDER. Yes, sir; to give an opportunity for a legal study of the case.

Senator LENROOT. And the action of your department, legally, was no more effectual than it was before that order—legally, I am speaking of?

Gen. CROWDER. Legally, yes. In practice it was, with the exception of the very small number of cases, effective with the exception I have stated; just as effective as if we had had the power ourselves to issue the order; because in only a very limited number of cases did the reviewing authorities disagree with us.

Senator LENROOT. At some point I would like to get your views upon the report of the Kernan Board as to the power of Congress as against the absolute power of the commander in chief that is upheld. I do not know whether you care to go into it now.

Gen. CROWDER. I think I have probably indicated my view. I am not predisposed to question the constitutionality of laws; and I am more in the attitude of assuming, and I am at present in the attitude of conceding, that Congress, in the exercise of its power to make rules and regulations for the government of the land and naval forces, may a court of appeals. I am willing to assume, anyway, that and rest the whole case upon the expediency and advantage of locating the power in such a way as to shut the President commanding generals under him off from the consideration of vital to the discipline of the Army.

• LENROOT. That was all I wanted to know.

• ROWDER. I think there are certain papers that I would like to bring forward and introduce, at this point. Perhaps I had better take up the question of the pending bill, because when I get through with it, I am going to have all these situations we have discussed before us in concrete form, and I think it will be very helpful in concluding the bill on matters directly relevant to the real issues.

• WARREN. I want to ask you one question, and perhaps I may ask it. I notice that Senator Chamberlain, as a member of the committee, put the question directly to Gen. Chamberlain, Chief of Staff, and to the Adjutant General, if there was any personal feeling in the matter leading to the nomination and report. In your examination of the case, or in your opinion, and your alluding to your relations to Gen. Ansell, is there any special feeling of enmity between you, or is it a review of the facts, apart from any feeling?

• ROWDER. I believe you asked Gen. Ansell that question at

• WARREN. I did not, as I was not present.

• ROWDER. At least it was referred to, and he answered that at a certain time our relations were pleasant.

• WARREN. Better make a frank statement, and you can judge whether it is better to leave it in the record.

I became Judge Advocate General, some time in 1910 I met, though I did not know him personally, what I thought was meritorious legal work performed by the then Lieut. Ansell. He was stationed, I think, in New York Harbor. I wrote him a letter letting him know when he came to Washington to drop in and see me, and we might discuss some matters of mutual interest. In a few days he came. I told him about this work that I had noticed of interest, and conversed with him about legal matters, and turned aside to other papers. When I was ready to resume the conversation—

• WARREN. Was he in the line at this time?

• ROWDER. He was in the line. When I was ready to resume, he said that he was visibly affected. He apologized, saying that it was an unusual experience for him to have a superior officer discuss his own work on his own motion any merit in his work; that he had thought it was his duty for a man to work his eyes out in the United States Army and not to gain any recognition. I said to him then, "How would you like to come into the Judge Advocate General's Department?" At that time I was senior assistant, but expected to be appointed Judge Advocate General in a few weeks. He said that, of course, it was his life's ambition. I told him I had nothing to offer him at that time, but that something better would develop after a while, and I asked him if he would take that? He said that he would like to talk it over with his family about it. He went home, and in a short time he wrote me that he would take it, and he was ordered out there to Gen. Pershing, who was in command. In about a year I received a letter from Gen. Pershing thanking me for sending him such an able man, saying that he knew more law than all the judges in Mindanao put together. The same mail or the next one, brought me a letter from Gen. Ansell saying that Pershing was an impossible man to serve with, and asking to be relieved. I saw that there was a situation there that did not make for efficiency. I relieved him and brought him home and assigned him to duty in New York Harbor, and late, in March, 1912, my high estimate of him continuing, I brought him to the office here in Washington.

I want to say right now that I do not know of a more acute legal mind than Gen. Ansell has. He is a very able man, and has rendered the department, and me, conspicuous service. Our relations for the next four years were as intimate as relations well could be between officers who worked in daily contact with each other and what those relations were is evidenced by some letters I received from him. These I think are the most convincing answer that could be made to your question.

Ordinarily I would hesitate to utilize these letters which, though not marked personal, breathe a personal relation, and a man ordinarily keeps such on his private files. However, these letters do establish a fact responsive to your inquiry, viz, that the most cordial, intimate personal and official relations existed between Gen. Ansell and myself, after four years of daily contact, and that these first four years of our relations can be dismissed from your mind as furnishing any incident whatever out of which the vindictive hostility he has recently expressed toward me could have grown, and by necessary inference negative many of the personal allegations against me that he has recently made.

Senator WARREN (after reading letters). Would you like to have these letters go into the record?

Gen. CROWDER. I would rather decide that question after I complete my statement.

Senator WARREN. That will rest entirely with you, whether they shall go in or not.

(The letters referred to are here printed in the record, as follows:

(Letter undated, envelope bearing post-mark Washington, D. C., July 26, 9.30 p. m., 1916.)

STEAMER "NORTHLAND."

MY DEAR GENERAL: While waiting for the "cast off" whistle, I am going to obey a present impulse and, in a word, express, however inadequately, my great gratitude for all that you have done for me.

You and your sentiments toward me have exerted a wonderful influence over my life. Without you and them, without your unfailing kindness, without your confidence in me—which has served as an inspiration—my life in the Army would have been a desert. Under you and with the opportunities so generously afforded me I no longer remember, much less experience, the restricting influence and environment of military life. Under you I have had the opportunity of developing intellectual integrity through intellectual liberty. Else than this is the meanest slavery and yet as I saw it at least, intellectual slavery was my lot before coming to you.

This phase of my service with you means much more than I can express. Had you done nothing more for me, you had done enough.

Your little kindnesses—such as bringing me to the boat—make service with you a personal pleasure as well. In your office my life seems filled with the little things and the big in ungrudging measure. Because of these my life is one of real happiness.

I wish you but had your just deserts.

May God forever and ever bless you.

S. T. A.

Gen. CROWDER. After receipt of the foregoing letter, the following undated letter was received:

Gen. CROWDER:

I had an unexpected call this morning from Gen. J. A. Johnston (accompanied by a classmate of mine), who, though I have never known him, apparently came for no other purpose than to tell me of some very laudatory things you said of me last night in his presence.

Such praise, though it is unmerited, works in me a new and vigorous inspiration to do all that a limited capacity will permit. Praise from a discriminating superior is always gratifying, and it is especially so where, as in this case, it is the expression of a disinterested and appreciative soul.

I resort to this note to express a sentiment which I could not express orally without embarrassment and which a sense of gratitude will not permit me to leave unspoken.

Gratefully.

S. T. ANSELL.

Both of these letters were written after an intimate office association of four years.

There is one other memorandum, written on April 24, 1917, to the Secretary of War, the underscored sixth and seventh paragraphs of which would seem to bring our friendly and cordial relations down to a still later date. I insert this memorandum in its entirety for the further reason that certain of its statements furnish proof of the plan that the War Department had conceived and confidentially communicated to governors of States which Senator Chamberlain has made an issue in this investigation. The memorandum follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT.

OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL.

Washington, April 24, 1917.

Memorandum for Secretary Baker.

1. I have just returned from a conference with Congressman Bankhead and others, had at your direction with reference to the pending bill. I think I discern a situation in the House (or one certainly affecting many Members of it) which is of such importance and affords such an opportunity for effective service that I ought to present it to you now.

2. The bill does, as it must, and as you, we, and perhaps they, know it must, clothe the President—that is, in fact, the War Department—with extraordinary power and discretion as to the methods and means of executing the draft. This is the crux of the situation. The necessary vagueness, uncertainty, and even inability to express the details give rise to vague apprehensions. It is here that assurance is needed, and I feel that you, right now, may properly give it, and, if my judgment is worth anything, ought to give it.

3. The difficulty concerns itself more with the matter of personnel, agencies, and methods of administration than with legal principles. Conscription is, though it ought not to be, esteemed as an odious term. It suggests not only the strong arm of an all-powerful central government, but the military arm at that. The prevalent idea is that a man wearing the military uniform of his government—which is synonymous with an authority to exercise physical force and compulsion without legal limit—intrudes the order of civil life and ruthlessly takes from his home a free man and makes him a sort of government serf. The idea is that the military mind is mechanical, harsh, unsympathetic, with a leaning, perhaps, toward the aristocratic classes. The prevailing idea is that the central administration, the head, the agencies, the furthestmost tentacles of the system are to be purely military. Putting myself in the place of a Congressman, as one must do in order to understand his difficulties, I can appreciate the reasons for the inquiry and the desire to receive assurances that the methods of administration will be such as to insure absolute fairness and based upon a knowledge and regard for our institutions, our people, and their daily lives.

4. Government to our people is a fearsome thing, a thing not understood, a thing that seems to be mechanical and unhuman, a thing that takes no note of the individual except perhaps to crush him. We must tear aside the veil and reveal the fact that the President, the Secretary of War, and the highest military officers are just plain ordinary human beings, like all others, who do understand our people, who come from them, and who are sympathetic with and for them, and who will respect as far as on principle we can respect, their human qualities.

5. While, of course, the greatest argument in favor of the draft system is that it is the only effectual one, to my mind the greatest political argument is that it is the only fair one. Ordinary human beings will be far less concerned with the effectuality than with the fairness of the system. Fairness is the greatest text, it seems to me, that a Congressman can have to convert his people to the idea.

There is a fear that this vast Executive power will be organized and exercised so as to fear some and favor some and result in unfairness. Many questions are raised. Who will determine who shall go and who shall stay? How will the fact be determined? Who are going to administer the law? Will it not be oppressively administered? Will we be approached by the military authorities in the spirit of having us cooperate or of regarding us as a driven herd?

The strong arm of the military must not be too apparent. You have planned that it shall not be. You have decentralized. You intend to intrust the execution of the law as it affects our people directly to their accustomed officials. There is to be no military member of the local boards. When all this is revealed much apprehension will be allayed.

6. But central administration must be intrusted to careful hands. The law must be administered in such a spirit of common understanding and a capacity to cooperate; with such sympathy for all civil institutions, our traditions and even our prejudices as to be worthy of and to receive the confidence of our people. I have said before that, loving the Army as I do, I can not assume, and it is no reflection upon officers of our Army for one not to assume, that the ordinary officer has the requisite qualities. I have already said that there is one man in this department whom I believe to be superbly qualified. I believe that assurances should be given that the central administration will be guided by a man who is a lawyer as well as a soldier, knows our institutions, our people, and their human qualities.

7. All this is leading up to my suggestion, which is: The letters which have been sent to the governors ought, in my opinion, to be given to the press with an appropriate statement, and assurances should further be given that the central administration is to be under legal supervision, in strict conformity with the law, with nothing omitted to insure fairness, and everything done to obviate all suggestion of oppressiveness.

S. T. A.

So far as I know, these relations continued down to his appointment as brigadier general in the Judge Advocate General's Department in October of 1917.

I never began to suspect any other than a loyal attitude toward the office and myself until there occurred the incident of his addressing me on the subject of being named Acting Judge Advocate General under the provision of section 1132 of the Revised Statutes. I was not giving much time to the office. I was very much engrossed with the selective draft.

Senator LENROOT. About when was that?

Gen. CROWDER. That was about November 3, 1917. He has put the correspondence in the record. (See pp. 52-53 and pp. 221-22, Ansell's testimony before this committee.) As I say, I was not giving much attention to the affairs of the department—I was too much engrossed with the draft. I did not know what the thoughts of the Secretary of War might be. I knew he shared my estimate of Gen. Ansell's legal ability, and it would have been reasonable if he had desired Gen. Ansell to exercise full control. We were all looking forward to the probability that the war would collapse. In this view I replied to Gen. Ansell, telling him to take the matter up with the Secretary of War directly, and whatever order the Secretary of War made would be satisfactory to me. I said "directly with the Secretary of War" for a purpose. I suppose that 60 per cent of the Judge Advocate General's business with the Secretary of War the Chief of Staff does not see at all. It goes direct. The Secretary of War is much concerned in getting a Judge Advocate General who can handle the civil part of his jurisdiction, such as contracts, river and harbor work, real property, and execution of the law of navigable waters. Much of his civil jurisdiction presents very many complicated questions. This was well known, of course, to Gen. Ansell and I expected that he would go direct to the Secretary of War with the proposition. Instead of doing that he went to the Acting Chief of Staff with a statement that I concurred in the issuing of an order for my relief and his designation. The Acting Chief of Staff never even submitted it to the Secretary of War, and the order was marked for suspended publication. I think that on November 10, when he submitted this brief contending for appellate jurisdiction in the Judge Advocate General, reversing the whole practice of the administration of military justice, he really believed that he was in charge of the office and was thereby absolved from the necessity of consulting me.

I never knew that the order had issued until November 17, when the Secretary of War sent for me and handed me a list of appointments that Ansell had recommended—judge advocates from civil life—and asked me what I thought of it. I looked them over and I told him I had a personal knowledge of many of the men, and that I thought they were all good appointments. He said that he had asked Gen. Ansell whether he had submitted the list to me and that Ansell had replied that he had not, and then said he had brought him an order relieving me as Judge Advocate General and designating himself. I told him of the correspondence between Ansell and myself on this subject, but that I knew of no order having issued. He replied that the order had issued without his knowledge. This, you will understand, was six days before I ever heard about these November briefs.

SENATOR WARREN. Who was Acting Chief of Staff at that time?

GEN. CROWDER. Gen. Biddle was Acting Chief of Staff. Well, the Secretary of War explained to me that he did not intend that I should be relieved; that he expected to confer with me from time to time about legal matters, and it would be embarrassing or inconvenient not to have me in charge of the office. There followed the following correspondence between us:

NOVEMBER 17, 1917.

MY DEAR GEN. CROWDER: As the time approaches for the reassembling of Congress and the consideration of many actively controverted questions of legal policy affecting the Military Establishment, I write you this personal note to inquire something of the present character of your burdens as Provost Marshal General.

You will recall that in our discussions on your assumption of that work, I had a certain hesitancy, which was due to the fact that you would necessarily be withdrawn for a substantial part of your time from the active guidance of the Judge Advocate General's office, where I have learned so confidently to rely upon you, and I then expressed the hope that after the great machine necessary for the mobilization of the selective Army had been organized it would be possible for you gradually to give it less time—to leave it under your supervision still, but demanding less of your actual presence—so that you could, with justice to both offices, resume your activity in the Judge Advocate General's Department.

I am writing this note not in any way to question the wisdom of the apportionment of your time which you have so far made. The fine perfections of the results of the administration of the selective-service law could have been attained in no other way than by the sleepless vigilance with which you have applied yourself to it. But I shall be happy when that work is so far advanced as to be more nearly automatic and to leave you free to return to your task here, and so I am making this inquiry as to your own estimate of the situation.

Cordially, yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

Gen. E. H. CROWDER,

NOVEMBER 18, 1917.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I am deeply appreciative of the statements in your personal letter of this date respecting my resumption at an early date of my supervision of the Judge Advocate General's Office and Department.

In response to your request that I fix a date when I could, with justice to both offices—the Provost Marshal General's and the Judge Advocate General's—resume my activity in the Judge Advocate General's Department, I have to advise you as follows:

The revised regulations providing for a national classification and governing the second and subsequent draft have been printed and distributed to boards. The organization of the medical and legal advisory boards in the several States is well under way and will be completed at an early date. I may say for your information that State headquarters, district boards, and local boards have been so enthusiastic in their approval of the new scheme and have evinced such a complete understanding of it that I do not anticipate great administrative difficulty in connection with the future administration of this department.

I feel myself free to advise you that I can resume my active supervision of the work of the Judge Advocate General's Department at once, to the extent of giving at least half of my time to that office and continue at the same time an efficient adequate supervision of this office. This is my estimate of the situation.

I thank you for the terms in which you have expressed yourself in your letter of this date.

E. H. CROWDER,

Upon receipt of my letter, the Secretary of War canceled the order making Gen. Ansell Acting Judge Advocate General.

It is true that Gen. Ansell's attempt to secure an order giving him my functions as Judge Advocate General was practically concurrent with his preparation of a brief urging a revolution in the military system and his circulation of a document of such grave consequence among every officer in my office without giving me the slightest information of his efforts; but it is not true that I knew of the brief until after the Secretary of War directed the rescinding of the unpublished order appointing him Acting Judge Advocate General.

It is further true that the brief of November 10, filed by Gen. Ansell, did not tend to increase my confidence in Gen. Ansell. In that brief a decision was referred to and a statute quoted only in part which, when read in full, rendered the decision of no value to the proposal it was invoked to support. Dicta, in a compendium of judicial definition, concerning the word "review" were cited from a page upon which were found more pertinent definitions absolutely refuting his view, and no reference made to the more pertinent definitions. It was urged in that brief that the power which it was contended had been granted by section 1199, Revised Statutes, had been used during the Civil War and for a considerable period thereafter; when the most cursory review of the records was convincing that such was not the case. It was stated further that the question had not been addressed by the Federal courts, when the most frequently consulted volume in the office disclosed that such was not the case and referred directly to the instance in which the question had been addressed and the contention overruled, and further the case was found pasted in our office file of the Federal Reporter. Finally, it was urged unequivocally that such a power resides in the British judge advocate general, when exactly the reverse is true, the actual point having been authoritatively decided in a joint opinion of the attorney and solicitor general of Great Britain in 1873.

When it is remembered that this was in no sense a controversial brief, but a memorandum addressed to the Secretary of War by Gen. Ansell, who stood in the rôle of his legal adviser, and that it was intended to commit the Secretary to a course as revolutionary as any ever taken by an administrative officer, I think I may be justified in the feeling of caution that replaced my former implicit trust.

I think I can fairly say, however, that this feeling of caution was in no way permitted then, or at any time thereafter, to interfere with the full use of his conceded talents in the task to which he had been assigned.

And this seems to be the view of the Inspector General of the Army, who has inquired into the administration of the office, and who finds, if I read his report correctly, that on and after this incident, although his order was canceled detailing him as Acting Judge Advocate General—leaving him to function as such by virtue of seniority—his initiative was in no manner impaired or disturbed.

My own thought and feelings toward Gen. Ansell are fairly set forth in what I here say. However, Gen. Ansell interjects a matter into his letter of March 11 which connects up with this period, and which was intended to show that I had largely abandoned the office and interest in its administration, and that his actions respecting the issue of executive orders relieving me and detailing himself in full charge of the office, as well as in submitting the November brief without my knowledge, were "in due course"—I refer here to a statement which is set forth in the record of hearings, page 220, as follows:

When I came to be the head of this office in the latter days of August, 1917, Gen. Crowder at that time, doubtless placing in me the utmost confidence, came to me and said that he never intended to return to this office again; that he had always aspired to a line command, and that he intended to use his office of Provost Marshal General in the raising of this new Army to secure for himself a field command. He told me to manage the office in my own way and without further reference to him.

I particularly asked whether I should consult him upon matters of general policy, and especially upon appointments, of which many would have to be made. He said "No," but added, "If I should wish the appointment of any particular Judge Advocate for my special purposes, I will let you know" (p. 220).

I take it that there is no one within the Army with whom I was in any sort of personal contact who did not know of my very great desire for assignment to field command in this World War. But the inference which the reader of this charge of Gen. Ansell's is left free to make is that I proposed to administer the selective draft in such a way as to make necessary my assignment to a field command, and that I proposed to bestow a few appointments in the Judge Advocate General's department to further this same special purpose. Of course, no conversation between Gen. Ansell and myself, capable of being so construed, ever occurred. If it had occurred, Gen. Ansell had a very plain and obvious duty—first, to decline to take over the affairs of the department which was to be corruptly administered in part by me for such a purpose, and second, to report the matter to superior military authority with a view to my trial by court-martial. Failing to adopt either course, it must be assumed, I think, that this construction of our conversation is an afterthought, expressed by him now for the purposes connected with the present investigation.

This invention of Gen. Ansell has not even the merit of plausibility. He says that the conversation occurred in the latter part of August. The first appointments to field command in the National Army were announced on August 5, 1917. Shortly thereafter I was informed that, although recommended by Gen. Bliss, Chief of Staff, I was not recommended by the General Staff, and that the Secretary of War had adopted the view of the General Staff. My relations with Gen. Ansell at the time (August, 1917) were sufficiently direct and personal to make it probable that he knew from me the facts that I have related above and further that after these first announcements I dismissed all hope of appointment to command rank. But Gen. Ansell says that the conversation between us took place after the events above narrated occurred.

From and after the first appointments, which included many of my juniors, I had given up all thought of appointment to command rank and assignment to field duty in France. It is a fact that I never again contemplated field assignment until a year later, in August, 1918, when the press reports gave first mention of the probability of an expeditionary force to Russia. Then I took up with the Secretary of War, directly and in a personal interview, my claims for field assignment to Russia. I do not doubt that the Secretary of War will recall this personal interview and my statement to him at the time that I had regarded his decision in early August of 1917 as settling the question once and for all, that I was not to be given command rank and field assignment in France, but that I felt that the problem in Russia would be both a reconstruction and a fighting problem; and that as I had had extended experience in provisional military government, both in Cuba and the Philippines, I felt justified in being even aggressive in laying claim to the Russian assignment. If he has any difficulty in recalling the facts I think most of them can be gleaned from a letter which I sent to the Secretary of War on the day following this personal interview, confirming my statements in that interview, which letter went by reference from the Secretary of War to the Chief of Staff and is doubtless on file in the office of the Chief of Staff.

Undoubtedly I had conversations with Gen. Ansell about the conduct of the office of the Judge Advocate General. I think it quite possible that I told him that he was to have a free hand in the management of that office, and I know that it was in my mind to say, and I probably did say, to him, that in respect of appointments of judge advocates there were several cases to which I had given consideration and that I wished to be consulted in order that I might reveal the status of those applications. The statement that I used language indicating that I desired to use these appointments as a means of building up an influence which would help me to secure a line appointment is wholly untrue.

That Gen. Ansell was not fully cooperating in the administration of the approved policies of the office is evidenced by his attitude toward the issue of General Order No. 7, about which so much has been said. In respect of this order, Gen. Ansell has said of record:

But the duties of the Judge Advocate General were so defined there, I said, that we would be limited, in the administration of military justice, to what was set out in that order, and that we would be denied the power, which I deemed to be a very necessary one, in the administration of justice, to recommend clemency to the President of the United States in all cases. So it had been held while I was away that this ed as a limitation to that effect, and there had been no recommendation for consequent upon these reviews and studies we made since the time of the issue of General Order No. 7 until after I got back (p. 182, Hearings).

Upon in his testimony Gen. Ansell makes a claim that this is based upon the power to recommend clemency, which was sought to be introduced from General Order No. 7, "applied, as well, to recommendations addressed to subordinate commanders, as to the President."

I call the attention of this committee to General Order No. 7, as published in this record, pages 132-133, and ask your decision and judgment as to whether that order could reasonably be construed as limiting in any way the power of the Judge Advocate General to initiate recommendations for clemency. I can not discuss this question very well which does not arise out of some concrete case or case of the order issued. Gen. Ansell, in his reference to this, cites you to no such language, and yet he says that, when he returned from his trip to Europe, he—was pulled by the horns, because it was nothing less than that, and I reversed what the Judge Advocate General had in my absence very properly, as a matter of fact, to be the limitations placed upon our office to recommend clemency, and directed the boards to review and recommend clemency in proper cases. (P. 182.)

The fact is that the practice of the Judge Advocate General's office in recommending clemency was never interrupted. Recommendations for clemency in appropriate cases have always been made. Nothing found in General Order No. 7 prevented or restricted that practice. I never knew that such an interpretation of the order was made by anyone until I read the testimony and read Gen. Ansell's statement to the contrary. He did not raise that objection to General Order No. 7 in the memorandum he filed in objection to the order (pp. 93-94), although he says he was not consulted about the effect of the order; nor did he, while acting on such cases, entertain any such view. The proof of what I say is record proof. As late as July 7, 1918, two months and a half after General Order No. 7 had been put in force, and just before Gen. Ansell's departure for France, I myself returned a record to a division commander with the advice that a sentence was legal, coupled with a recommendation that it be approved (Case 112666, Clifton Cox, Apr. 17, 1918). During Gen. Ansell's absence in France, the Acting Judge Advocate General was Major J. Mayes, who certainly recommended clemency in one case within General Order No. 7 (Case 115198, James Cox, June 19, 1918).

Whatever instructions Gen. Ansell gave upon his return to the department to recommend clemency in proper cases, inaugurated no new practice in respect, and it was never necessary to do violence to General Order No. 7 in recommending such clemency. I treat this matter extensively in Appendix No. III(c) of my testimony, and show conclusively by testimony given by Col. Clark and Col. Davis that the office construction of General Order No. 7 was not what Gen. Ansell states it was.

Gen. Ansell consulted in the preparation of General Order No. 7. On page 134 of his testimony before this committee Gen. Ansell says that he was not so consulted, in the following language: "Although I had brought them to the attention of the department, I was not invited to participate in those matters," but goes on to say:

"The officer in the department, however, handed me the original draft of the order, and it so strongly on the matter that I took it to Gen. Crowder and said, 'It is true this is a step in the right direction, but it does not go far enough. * * *." And after some two or three weeks' argument the order was finally amended and probably published in February, so as to stay all sentences in cases not only of death but of dismissal and of dishonorable discharge, until we could study the record and advise—having no authority—the commanding general. (P. 134.)

The truth is that so far from Gen. Ansell not being consulted about these matters, there is positive evidence that he did participate in the general consideration of this order when in preparation, in a memorandum which is on file in the department, dated January 12, 1918, entitled "Memorandum for Gen. Crowder" and signed "S. T. Ansell" discussing the proposed General Order No. 7 which was known in the office as "Maj. Davis's proposed rule," which memorandum is set forth on pages 93 to 94 of the testimony of Gen. Ansell before this committee.

When I review all of these facts in connection with your question as to the relations between Gen. Ansell and me I discover him, from and after the turning down of his November 10 brief contending for appellate power in himself, in an attitude which can not be said to have been a cooperative one with the established policies of the office. While occasionally using the power of clemency recommendations, it was not used vigorously to correct an evil which, according to his own testimony, was of growing magnitude. Unquestionably he would have dealt with these matters efficiently enough if he had been allowed himself to exercise appellate power, but his attitude seems to have been that of a man who would put out a fire with his own hose or would otherwise let the building burn.

I need not speak of later events. The utterances before this subcommittee indicate such a hostile attitude toward me as to leave you in no doubt. But it would seem that I share this hostility with practically the whole Army.

May I digress for a moment to make what appears to me a very pertinent inquiry? Why is it that the Navy, with a system of military justice identical with that of the Army, has gotten through this World War without any agitation against their system, for I assure you that the systems are identical as to fundamentals; and the conditions were more or less identical. They are lacking in this appellate power. They expanded from 50,000 to 750,000 men, or more than 1,400 per cent, while we expanded from about 200,000 to nearly 4,000,000—or about 2,000 per cent.

SENATOR WARREN. Now, General, right there; they did not have men at the front in battle, and that might be stated as some reason. But, if I understand you correctly, and the other witnesses that have been before the committee, these sentences—that is, on the minor offenses, and very severe sentences, long-time sentences, etc.—occurred in the Army here.

GEN. CROWDER. A good many of them occurred in the Army here. That is what makes the comparison between the naval service and our own appropriate.

SENATOR LENROOT. Were there such long sentences in the Navy?

GEN. CROWDER. Apparently the Navy found a way of controlling the matter of long sentences, whether by use of the power of clemency or by admonition to courts, or by duly promulgated admonitions upon the measure of punishment, I do not know. They drew their officers and jackies from the same American homes from which we drew our officers and soldiers. They had the same problems of discipline before them—and yet they seem to have gotten through the war without any public agitation or scandal. How did they do it? I think that the answer will be found to be that they had an energetic, alert man at the head of the Department of Naval Justice, supported by a loyal, enthusiastic personnel, and using every authority which they had under the existing law, but assuming no extraordinary authority like appellate power in the Judge Advocate General to keep down the measure of punishment. The fact is that they achieved good results by proper administrative methods under a system that is fundamentally identical with our own. If our code is a code of organized injustice, “unworthy of the name of law,” so, too, is theirs. If radical amendments are to be made in our code along fundamental lines, radical amendments should be made in the naval code as well.

Certainly the Congress of the United States is not going to extend relief to the Army in such a matter and leave the Navy to live under a code which is a code of organized injustice, “unworthy the name of law.” There would be something very inconsistent in finding the Army system fundamentally wrong, and, by new legislation, destroying its fundamentals, as it is proposed to do in the pending bill, and in leaving the Navy under the kind of a system which is so severely condemned for the Army.

Senator WARREN. Just an instant, General. I had occasion to appeal to the Navy, both in the regular naval service and the marine service, which is like our Army, of course, in two or three cases, and I have had—I will not say instant action, but action very soon, where a man has been tried and sentenced to dishonorable discharge and confinement, where the man has wanted to go back into the service and reenlist and cure his misdoing. They have been very quick to act upon it; and I know of two or three cases, one of which was in the marine service, where simply the request was all that was necessary. It was so, very, very frequently. I suppose the same thing was done in the Army.

Gen. CROWDER. It ought to have been done.

Senator WARREN. It could be done?

Gen. CROWDER. It could be done.

Senator LENROOT. Do I understand that it is your thought that the courts-martial in the Army felt that these excessive sentences were rather favored by the War Department, and that was one of the reasons for them?

Gen. CROWDER. No; I do not think they felt that they were favored by the War Department, but they thought that the deterrent effect of the heavy sentences was needed, and they found themselves unchecked by the War Department.

Senator LENROOT. And you think they were checked, probably, by the Navy Department?

Gen. CROWDER. I do not know what happened in the Navy Department. I know that they got through without any of this agitation, when they had the same kind of law to enforce that we had, and practically the same conditions to face.

There is no effective regulation by statute of maximum limits of punishment in the British service. I noticed, however, a circular issuing out of the British war office cautioning the courts upon the subject of unequal sentences during the war, and admonishing them that punishment within certain limits would, in the judgment of the war department, meet the requirements of discipline.

Senator LENROOT. Do you think that would have been within the proper jurisdiction of the Judge Advocate General's office?

Gen. CROWDER. To suggest to the President?

Senator LENROOT. Yes.

Gen. CROWDER. To ask the issue of an order of that kind, to suggest, yes; the Judge Advocate General could have done it at any time. And when I went back to the office to catch this storm of accusation, the first thing I did was to request the issue of that kind of an order, reminding the field commanders that the armistice had been signed, that hostilities had ceased, and that the old presidential limits of punishment ought to be observed except in cases where they were willing to make of record the existence of circumstances which would justify a higher punishment than was provided in the President's limits governing in time of peace. That order was issued.

Now, when I was preparing that order I called into conference the head of the military-justice section, and he said he could supply me with the verbiage of the order, because he had submitted to Gen. Ansell the propriety of issuing or requesting the issue of that kind of an order back in September, 1918, and he said that Gen. Ansell directed that an order be prepared of that general character for submission to the War Department; but, he said, "We lost sight of it in some way, and it never was done."

Senator LENROOT. It never was submitted?

Gen. CROWDER. It never was submitted to the Secretary of War or to the Chief of Staff.

Senator LENROOT. I want to ask you, generally, so far as these excessive punishments related to this country, could there be any possible good in the way of discipline or otherwise, or what could have been in the minds of these officers on these courts, in inflicting these very excessive punishments?

Gen. CROWDER. Solely, as I see it, the deterrent effect; most of them having been adjudged after the call came from France that they needed bullets rather than bread, and when our commands were disintegrating through absences without leave and other offenses that seemed to show a lack of the discipline that the Army would have to have if it was to go up against as determined an enemy as the Hun. And they adopted the view then and there that the only means that they had to strengthen the discipline of the Army was heavy sentences of courts-martial—not the only means, but the essential one.

Senator LENROOT. Do you think, from the standpoint of deterrent effect alone, that there is any difference between a 10-year sentence and a 25-year sentence?

Gen. CROWDER. Personally, I do not.

Senator LENROOT. No.

Gen. CROWDER. I think it was a mistaken view, and that was the time to speak a word, especially to Army commanders in this country, and I believe if that word had been spoken we would have heard nothing about this, because I have yet to encounter a disposition the part of commanding generals in the field to reject advice from the War Department, or a disposition on their part to throw themselves into any kind of hostility to duly communicated action or request. It is true that the Secretary of War could have directed or controlled courts as to the quantum of punishment, nor the commanding generals as to the amount of punishment they could approve, but he could have requested them to observe limits, and I believe that request would have been effective; an alert man at the head of the department would have followed the course where it was necessary to keep down these heavy sentor WARREN. As I understand it—and I want you to correct me if I am wrong—the machinery of your department when you were in it was a matter of fact, the Judge Advocate General, and Gen. Ansell was acting, was somewhat out of gear during these times when the thought of severe punishments, etc., came up; there was not that kind of action that had preceded.

CROWDER. Strange to say, I was so absorbed in the draft that I had little or no knowledge of the fact that these sentences were given, and there was little discussion between Gen. Ansell and myself regarding them prior to the armistice, that I can now understand it; certainly, I had no adequate warning from him of the conditions which he has sensationalized before the country. As I say, when he doubled the number of men to be furnished in March of 1918, he trebled the number for April, and trebled it again for May and then put upon me the almost insurmountable task of furnishing 401,000 men in July, I lost all contact with the rest of the

I was oblivious to what was going on up there in the Judge Advocate General's office along those lines; and I never got the situation until I went back after the armistice to take control of the department. Since then I have had the duty of trying to explain the situation to the American people and to Congress, as they called for an explanation.

What was remaining, this matter of trying to interpret the pending situation and its application to a particular case, but I notice that it is now 1 o'clock.

Senator WARREN. Yes; I have to go into a conference with the President at 2 o'clock, and Senator Lenroot has a matter upon the floor of the Senate, so that we shall have to adjourn over.

It is a matter of fact that permission was given to Gen. Ansell while he was in the field to say what he chose about anybody or anything, practically, and for that reason I wanted to say that so far as the committee was concerned there was nothing held back.

CROWDER. There is a mass of accusation and defamation which I shall call the attention of the committee later. In the course of it—quoting it—I exhausted an alphabet, and then some, of personal accusations against myself.

Senator WARREN. Do you mean that you have assembled all that?

CROWDER. Of one witness only, Gen. Ansell, and there are several accusations against the Secretary of War that carry you through the alphabet to V, as I now remember; and there are several accusations against the American Bar Association committee, against the bureau chiefs, against Gen. Kreger, against the Inspector General, and against ex-President Taft, and I have it all extracted here; and before I get through with my testimony I want to pass up to the committee the responsibility of leaving it unanswered. If it is true, if it is only half true, yes, if it is one-tenth true, it is the duty, it seems to me, if I may be permitted to suggest it, of the House of Representatives, to present articles of impeachment, and of the Senate to organize itself into a high court of impeachment, and it is the duty of the President of the United States to take personal control of the War Department and order a few courts-martial.

Senator LENROOT. You think that court-martial would not be sufficient, and we would have to take up impeachment?

Gen. CROWDER. Yes; I think impeachment would be necessary.

(Thereupon, at 1 o'clock p. m., the subcommittee adjourned until Tuesday, Oct. 28, 1919, at 10 o'clock a. m.)

ESTABLISHMENT OF MILITARY JUSTICE—PROPOSED AMENDMENT OF THE ARTICLES OF WAR.

---

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 28, 1919.

UNITED STATES SENATE.
SUBCOMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to adjournment, in the room of the Committee on Appropriations at 10.30 o'clock a. m., Senator Francis E. Warren presiding.

Present: Senators Warren (chairman) and Lenroot.

STATEMENT OF MAJ. GEN. ENOCH H. CROWDER- Resumed.

Gen. CROWDER. Gentlemen, I thought I had discovered at our last session a desire, and, of course, a commendable one, to finish at the earliest date possible.

Senator WARREN. We certainly do not want to cut you off at all.

Gen. CROWDER. I can abridge what I have to say by introducing certain memoranda that I have prepared—personal accusations and my replies thereto—and would unhesitatingly follow that course but for the fact that it might be said by some that in following such a method I was avoiding cross-examination on my testimony. If I could be relieved of that inference, I would go ahead and greatly abridge the hearings by submitting these memoranda without reading them.

Senator LENROOT. I think that course will be entirely satisfactory to the committee; and, of course, if we desire to cross-examine you upon any points, we can do that later.

Gen. CROWDER. That will, of course, help out quite a good deal.

In the discussion of the November briefs at the last hearing, a reference was made to the Texas case, and at least one inquiry was made respecting the rank of the soldiers tried and the administrative course pursued with respect to them subsequent to the trial. Were they honorably restored to duty to serve out their original enlistment periods or were they permitted to reenlist? Did they lose their continuous-service status and their continuous-service pay?

TEXAS MUTINY CASES.

In speaking of these cases, Gen. Ansell says (p. 118):

Now [the Secretary], upon the advice of the Judge Advocate General . . . says to these unjustly convicted men: "I will do convenient justice. I will permit you to reenlist" * * * the Secretary said: "I will permit you to reenlist under a statute which says that when a man has been properly convicted and the Secretary of War believes that he has actually expiated his offense and has shown that he is a good man, the Secretary may then waive the inhibitions placed upon his reenlistment by the act of 1894, to the effect that no man who has been dishonorably discharged from the Army can be reenlisted therein. * * * Thus, these men are graciously permitted their reenlistment as a privilege in an Army from which they have been illegally expelled and in which they can start to work up again. They lose, besides, their right to continuous service and continuous-service pay." (P. 118.)

This statement is erroneous in the following regard: The men were not reenlisted, but were honorably restored under the act of March 4, 1915, which abolished military prisons and substituted in their stead the United States Disciplinary Barracks. That law permitted either reenlistment or honorable restoration—this honorable restoration to be effective to revive the original enlistment contract for a period equal to the period not served. Upon the completion of the full period, which would be the original period, a man with a good record after restoration would be entitled to an honorable discharge from that enlistment. The actual orders issued in the case of these men were the following:

JANUARY 2, 1918.

From: The Adjutant General of the Army.

To: The Commandant United States Disciplinary Barracks, Fort Leavenworth, Kans.

Subject: Restoration to duty.

In the case of each of the following-named general prisoners, the unexecuted portion of the sentence published in G. C. M. O. No. 1174, Southern Department, October 16, 1917, is remitted; he is honorably restored to duty under the enlistment entered into by him on the date set after his name; is transferred as private to the Field Artillery, unassigned, and is detailed to duty at the United States Disciplinary Barracks for a period not to exceed three months:

Rupert P. Orndorff, formerly private, Battery A, Eighteenth Field Artillery; enlistment of December 22, 1913.

Roger Graves, formerly private, Battery A, Eighteenth Field Artillery; enlistment of December 12, 1916.

Andrew J. Brown, formerly private, Battery A, Eighteenth Field Artillery; enlistment of November 23, 1914.

John Van De Vooren, jr., formerly private, Battery A, Eighteenth Field Artillery; enlistment of February 7, 1916.

Frank J. Adamik, formerly private, Battery A, Eighteenth Field Artillery; enlistment of February 10, 1916.

John J. Puryanda, formerly private, Battery A, Eighteenth Field Artillery; enlistment of July 20, 1915.

Wilfred R. Knight, formerly private, Battery A, Eighteenth Field Artillery; enlistment of January 14, 1916.

Clarence Maheu, formerly private, Battery A, Eighteenth Field Artillery; enlistment of September 19, 1913.

Calvin E. Kunselman, formerly private, Battery A, Eighteenth Field Artillery; enlistment of November 29, 1916.

Ralph K. Green, formerly private, Battery A, Eighteenth Field Artillery; enlistment of November 29, 1916.

By order of the Secretary of War.

J. A. BARRY,
Adjutant General.

The statement is erroneous in another regard. Gen. Ansell states that these men lost their right to "continuous service" and to "continuous service pay." This matter has been taken up by Maj. Bennett, of the Judge Advocate General's office, under my direction, and with the Auditor of the War Department and the Finance Officer of the War Department, with the result stated in the following memorandum:

OCTOBER 3, 1919.

A., SW.

um for Gen. Crowder:

ontinuous service pay—Texas mutiny case.

ordance with your direction, I have made an investigation as to the accuracy of statement of Gen. Ansell before the Senate Military Committee to the effect that the 10 men sentenced to dishonorable discharge in the Texas mutiny case were deprived of their rights, as a result of having been dishonorably discharged from the service, to receive continuous service pay.

These men were not deprived of their right to continuous service pay by reason of their dishonorable discharge from the service and subsequent restoration. The law, as interpreted by the finance officer of the War Department, and the Controller of the Treasury, where the facts are identical with the facts in the cases in question, are to the effect that the act of restoration places the man back in his old enlistment, and that during that enlistment period the man may, within the time specified in the continuous-service-pay act, reenlist and be entitled to and receive the increased pay provided for another enlistment period.

In this connection, so far as the records of the finance office and the office of the Auditor of the War Department show, has been raised as to the right to continuous service pay of the 10 men dishonorably discharged and later restored to duty. I was of the opinion that the finance office and the auditor's office that should this question later be presented under the present facts they would hold these men entitled to continuous service pay.

C. A. BENNETT,
Major, Judge Advocate.

Ansell, on pages 117-118, says:

Let us see what situation it left those men in, men of from 3 to 20 years' service: dishonored officers.

These men were branded as mutineers by the judgment of a court, irreversibly. Their service terminated that moment, their enlistment was cut short; continuity of their service was interrupted; their continuous-service pay had been withheld from them. (Page 118.)

The records of the office of The Adjutant General show that all of the men were serving in their first enlistment except one, Sergt. Poryanda, who was serving in his second enlistment, upon which he entered July 20, 1915; trial occurred September 17, 1917. Ansell's statement, therefore, as to the length of service of the men, is erroneous.

After discussing the November briefs, I referred to the fact that 17 of the 17 officers concurring with Gen. Ansell upon his holding that appellate power was vested in the Judge Advocate General by the terms of section 1199 of the Revised Statutes, subsequently before this committee withdrawn that concurrence and expressed their nonconcurrence in the conclusion. These officers were Lieut. Col. Alfred E. Clark, a lawyer from Portland, Oregon, commissioned in the Judge Advocate General's department and serving in the department throughout the war in the grades of major and lieutenant colonel; and Col. E. G. Davis, a lawyer from Idaho, a graduate of West Point, but who, for many years, has been practicing law in the State of Idaho, at Boise. I promised to place in the record where they had withdrawn that concurrence, and directed that to the stenographer to put in.

As urged by Senator Chamberlain to shorten his testimony as far as possible on this particular point, Lieut. Col. Alfred E. Clark replied:

And, I can conclude this then by simply saying that I did not finally agree with Gen. Ansell. (P. 173, hearing before the Senate Military Affairs Committee on Feb. 26, 1919; see also, pp. 172 and 174.)

The second officer, Col. E. G. Davis, testifying on the same day (see pp. 203 and 204 of the same hearing), said:

We (Col. Clark and himself) reached the conclusion that the better legal opinion was against the position which Gen. Ansell has assumed. (P. 204.)

I add these in order that my testimony may be complete by reference to the published hearings of the Senate Military Affairs Committee.

The reasons given by these officers are the foundation of my further statement that if all those gentlemen who concurred with Gen. Ansell on that brief were called before the committee and asked if they at present adhered to the view that section 1199, properly construed, conferred appellate power upon the Judge Advocate General, all but two or three might likewise withdraw their concurrence previously expressed. I have no personal knowledge of their views. I can only anticipate that when they are told that there was concealment in the November brief of an express grant of appellate power in the bankruptcy statute invoked as a legislative precedent; that the legislative history of section 1199 was inaccurately discussed, that the views and practice of Judge Advocates General Holt and Duum upon this subject were misstated; that the statement that no court in the United States had ever passed upon the question was erroneous; and that the statement that the Judge Advocate General of the British Army exercised this power was likewise erroneous; when they realized that all five propositions upon which Gen. Ansell's construction was predicated were either misstatements or misleading statements, they would have no course but to withdraw their concurrence.

Further, in discussing the November 7 briefs, I referred to the fact that in concluding my opinion of November 27 I had promised a further study of this question of appellate power, first to see if it could not be deduced out of the inherent power of the President as constitutional commander in chief. I also stated to the Secretary of War that if it could not be deduced in that way I would present a project of legislation which would confer this appellate power upon the President in express terms. I prepared that project of legislation conferring upon the President in express terms this appellate power, and submitted it to the Secretary of War in January, which he, in turn, submitted to the chairmen of the two military committees of Congress on January 19, 1918, with an elaborate presentation of the reasons why such legislation should be enacted. In respect of this project I have to answer the following charges made before this committee by Gen. Ansell:

I should like to say that I have never believed, and I have good reasons for not believing, that that bill was submitted to this body in good faith. That bill was drafted and submitted by the Judge Advocate General of the Army, through and with the approval of the Secretary of War. The question is, Did the Judge Advocate General of the Army and the Secretary of War at that time want any revisory power? And really, do they want any now? (P. 111.)

And further he said:

It is significant also that his (the Judge Advocate General's) interest was not such as to produce subsequent effort to secure the enactment of this legislation. (P. 219.)

Further criticizing the bill, Gen. Ansell says that if the Secretary of War and the Judge Advocate General had intended any rea revisory power, the bill itself is evidence to the contrary, and then adds that it gave the power—

(1) To set aside the finding of "not guilty," an acquittal, and to substitute for it a conviction; * * *

(2) To substitute a finding of a large offense for one of minor or lesser included degree; and

(3) To strike down a smaller punishment and substitute for it a larger one. (P. 110.)

He adds:

I can hardly conceive that anybody would submit such a bill as that to the Congress of the United States expecting it to pass upon thorough investigation, because few men in touch with the people of the United States, representatives of the people of the United States, would ever give their approval to a proposition that is so un-American, so basically illegal, and unjust and unfair, as to permit any man to strike down the judgment of a court to the disadvantage of the accused, substituting harsher punishment, harsher penalties, than the court awarded. (P. 111.)

I am frank to say that if the project of the bill formulated by me and transmitted by the Secretary of War to Congress means what Gen. Ansell says it means or can be reasonably construed to mean what he says it means, then I have given strong evidence of incompetency to discharge the duties of the office of the Judge Advocate General. Let us take up seriatim the construction Gen. Ansell places upon this bill.

In order for you to appreciate the points I have to make, it would be helpful if you had the bill before you.

Senator LENROOT. Where is that printed in this record?

Gen. CROWDER. It is on page 108 of this record.

Senator LENROOT. Yes; I have it.

Gen. CROWDER. I will wait long enough in my comment for you to glance over that bill. The italicized portion there.

Senator LENROOT (after examining the bill). Very well.

Gen. CROWDER. Now, the bill vests in terms in the President the power to set aside any finding in whole or in part. The words of grant in this project are "disapprove, vacate, or set aside," and that is all the power that the bill confers upon the President in respect of the findings. Where, I ask, is the power given to substitute a conviction for an acquittal?

Gen. Ansell's next contention is that the bill gives the power "to substitute the finding of a large offense for one of minor or lesser included degree." Where, I ask, is this power conferred? As I have said, the bill in terms gives the President the power "to disapprove, vacate, or set aside any finding in whole or in part." Is there anything said here about the power to substitute a finding of guilty of a larger offense for a finding of a smaller or included offense? Can anyone contend that under the language of this bill the President may substitute for a finding of guilty of manslaughter a finding of guilty of murder? Again I say it is impossible to understand how any such contention could be made.

Senator WARREN. Your contention is that it was all in the other direction?

Gen. CROWDER. But this construction of Gen. Ansell passed unchallenged, and a reader of what he said might conclude that his remarks were convincing to the committee.

Now, I have got something more.

Senator LENROOT. I would just like to ask you this: Your theory is that an acquittal, even though this would be translated as giving him a right to set aside a finding of an acquittal, and the court having dissolved, even if that had been set aside, there was no further power in the reviewing authority?

Gen. CROWDER. If the court had adjudged an acquittal both the reviewing authority and the President were absolutely powerless. They can not control the court.

Senator LENROOT. No; I mean under this bill.

Gen. CROWDER. This bill; it did not change the situation.

Senator LENROOT. Of course, technically, this would give power to set aside a finding of acquittal.

Gen. CROWDER. Yes; but the power of disapproval of an acquittal has been exercised from time immemorial under the common law, military, until recently when we changed all that by an Executive order. But there never was power in any reviewing authority, even the President, to substitute a conviction for the disapproved verdict of acquittal.

Senator LENROOT. Yes; but heretofore the President himself had no power to set aside a verdict.

Gen. CROWDER. Of acquittal?

Senator LENROOT. Yes.

Gen. CROWDER. Yes; he had, when he was the reviewing or confirming authority.

Senator LENROOT. Under what?

Gen. CROWDER. Under the common law, military.

Senator LENROOT. I had supposed the theory was that he had not.

Gen. CROWDER. Perhaps a part of our difficulty is in the use of words. I can not distinguish between the legal effect of the two terms, "disapprove" and "set aside."

Senator LENROOT. I had understood that it was taken for granted that while the President might disapprove a finding, that did not set aside the verdict. In other words, it did not remove the stigma, the mere disapproval, unless the court followed it out by action.

Gen. CROWDER. Disapprove a finding of acquittal?

Senator LENROOT. Yes; any finding.

Gen. CROWDER. If he disapproves a finding that is the end of the case; there is an absolute wiping out of the consequences.

Senator LENROOT. Oh, the consequences!

Gen. CROWDER. You can not disturb the historical fact that a court has met and has reached a finding of guilty.

Senator LENROOT. Yes.

Gen. CROWDER. But the reviewing or confirming authority is a part of the court. If he withholds approval of the findings of the court they have no validity; and yet we have always held that it had this much validity, that there has, in such case (except where the disapproval was based on jurisdictional grounds) been double jeopardy or a previous trial.

Senator LENROOT. I understand that; but I think it is very important whether I have misunderstood the theory throughout here. I had understood that one of the reasons why it was agreed by both sides to the controversy that there should be this appellate power vested somewhere, was that under the law as it now stands, while the President could relieve the defendant from the consequences of a verdict, he had no power to set aside that verdict. Now, am I wrong about that?

Gen. CROWDER. I do not think there is any difference between us, if we can understand the terms in which we are talking. When he disapproves a finding and a sentence, I can not myself distinguish the difference between that and the setting aside of the finding and sentence, because neither has any validity until it has the approval of the superior authority; and lacking validity it remains not a finding of guilty, not a sentence. It is just as necessary, Senator, that the reviewing authority approve in order to give the finding and sentence validity as it is that the court should have adjudged the finding and sentence.

Senator LENROOT. I may have gotten an entirely incorrect idea of what this involved. I had supposed that the defect in the law was that, while they had the power to disapprove, it only related to the execution of the judgment.

Gen. CROWDER. Oh, no.

Senator LENROOT. And that the very purpose, both of this bill and of the legislation—to that extent both sides are agreed—was to vest the power in some appellate body to set aside actually and remove the stigma of a verdict, in case it was wrongfully rendered.

Gen. CROWDER. I now see clearly what obstructs a complete understanding. There are two classes of cases to consider. First, those in which the President is the reviewing or the confirming authority; second, the large class of cases where a subordinate commander is the convening and reviewing authority and whose action by way of approval or disapproval is final. Taking the latter class of cases, suppose the subordinate commander disapproves a finding of guilty; what is there left of the case? Nothing. That man is in the condition of a man who has been acquitted. You need no remedy to reach his case.

Senator LENROOT. That is where the convening authority reviews?

Gen. CROWDER. Where the convening authority reviews.

Senator LENROOT. Yes.

Gen. CROWDER. The same thing is true in the class of cases which come from the court to the President as the convening or confirming authority. He withholds his approval, or he disapproves.

Senator LENROOT. The language is very different in the two cases.

Gen. CROWDER. I do not understand so.

Senator LENROOT. The language is very different in the two cases, is it not; of the power of the President and the power of the convening authority to review?

Gen. CROWDER. Not where they are both convening authorities.

Senator LENROOT. No; I understand; but where they appeal to the President?

Gen. CROWDER. Where the President is the confirming authority?

Senator LENROOT. Yes.

Gen. CROWDER. Then he passes upon both the findings of the court and the action of the convening authority below.

Now, in the cases where—and they are the great majority—the action of the reviewing authority below is final. The President had no power to wipe out the stigma of conviction, even though he was satisfied of the existence of prejudicial error that would invalidate that case. If it was not jurisdictional error he was without power, and the purpose of all this legislation is to give this power, so that the man will always have a remedy.

Senator LENROOT. Now you and I agree; but I do not understand the distinction that you make, General. Pardon me. I did not suppose that the power of the President to disapprove in any case as a confirming authority carried with it under existing law the power to set aside the proceeding itself.

Gen. CROWDER. As convening or confirming authority?

Senator LENROOT. Not of the convening authority, but of the President of the United States.

Gen. CROWDER. I have used both in my discussion of this subject.

Senator LENROOT. Oh, yes.

Gen. CROWDER. The power of the convening authority to disapprove a case, once exercised, is a complete absolution of that man. It has the full effect of an acquittal.

Senator LENROOT. Yes; of course, of the convening authority. Now, take it of the President as confirming authority?

Gen. CROWDER. Let us suppose that the convening authority below has approved. His action under the present code and until the issuance of the General Order No. 7, was final, except for jurisdictional error. The President was without any power. The purpose of all this legislation is to vest in the President, in this class of cases, the power to do just what the reviewing authority by law could have done, namely, to disapprove the findings and sentence.

Senator LENROOT. Then that is where I misunderstood you. What did you mean, General, when you said, as I understood you, that when the President of the United States disapproved the findings it set aside the whole proceeding under the existing law?

Gen. CROWDER. I meant that there was a limited class of cases in which the President is either the convening or the confirming authority, and in which limited class of cases his disapproval of the findings operates as an acquittal; but in the larger class of cases—the great majority—he is neither the convening nor the confirming authority, and has no power of disapproval under the present law.

Senator LENROOT. Yes; I understand that.

Gen. CROWDER. The President convened the court for the trial of Gen. Swaim, I think. He probably convened the courts for the trials of Gen. Hazen and Gen. Fitz-John Porter, but I am not certain.

Senator LENROOT. There he was the convening authority?

Gen. CROWDER. Yes; but more frequently is the confirming authority.

Senator LENROOT. Yes.

Gen. CROWDER. And what class of cases does he confirm? Cases of death and dismissal which the reviewing authority below has not the authority to confirm. In that limited class of cases he is the confirming authority. Now, in respect of those he has this same power that the reviewing authority below has to wipe the whole thing out by disapproval, and I think if your mind will rest upon this proposition you will have the issue clearly before you. Those two classes of cases in which the President is either convening or confirming authority you can largely ignore in discussing the necessity for appellate power, and fix your attention upon those cases where the action of the reviewing authority below is final under the present law, except as General Order No. 7 has operated to reserve jurisdiction. There is where the necessity for this appellate power exists. Now, I do not say that that project did not give the President more appellate power than he has as convening or confirming authority, but I do say that he has now that power of disapproval, in all cases where he is convening or confirming authority. He has not, of course, the power to substitute a finding of a lesser and an included offense, as we intended to give it in that proposed new legislation, but he did have this power of disapproval; and when the President wipes out a trial below in the two classes of cases he is competent to consider, namely, cases where he himself has ordered the trial, and cases where under the law he is the confirming authority, it is just as if there had been no trial.

I am very glad that this matter was brought up, because it is very important to understand the scope of this new legislation that is being sought, and what classes of cases it is going to reach.

Senator LENROOT. I think I understand you now.

Gen. CROWDER. But, still more important, Gen. Ansell declares that under the terms of the bill prepared by me for increased appellate powers in the President, it would be competent for the appellate authority to increase sentences adjudged by courts-martial. Heretofore I have been dealing with findings. Now I ask you to look again to see what power that bill gives to the President over a sentence, because I want to be understood in regard to this. The language employed in that bill as to sentences is "to modify, vacate or set aside" sentences. Clearly the power to increase sentences can not be found in that language unless it is contained in the word "modify." Before, in discussing the findings, we were dealing with the language, "to disapprove, vacate or set aside." Now we are dealing with language in part new, to "modify, vacate or set aside sentences." Clearly the power to increase sentences can not be found in the language unless it is contained in the word "modify." It needs but a moment's reflection to perceive that the word "modify" used in a penal statute is not susceptible of the meaning Gen. Ansell attributes to it.

The Century Dictionary gives the following as the primary definition of the verb "modify": "To qualify; especially, to moderate or reduce in extent or degree."

The Standard Dictionary gives its first meaning as "to make somewhat different;" and then adds the following: "To make more moderate or less sweeping; reduce in degree or extent; qualify; as, to modify a punishment."

Etymologically, as the dictionaries show, the word means "to set bounds to."

The word has been judicially defined, notably in the case of State v. Lawrence (7 Pac. 116; 12 Oreg. 297), a case frequently cited and whose definition is quoted in the Century Dictionary. The court there said:

What is meant by the words "may modify * * * grand juries?" In a general sense, to modify means to change or vary—to qualify or reduce; and unless there is something in the context, or special usage, the words are to be taken in their plain, ordinary, and popular sense. A power given to modify or abolish implies the existence of the subject-matter to be modified or abolished. When exercised to modify, it does not destroy identity, but effects some change or qualification in form or qualities, power or duties, purposes or objects, of the subject-matter to be modified, without touching the mode of creation. The word implies no power to create or to bring into existence, but only the power to change or vary in some particular an already created or legally existing thing.

It is true that there are some decisions which give to the word "modify" as used in civil statutes a meaning equivalent to "change"; but the weight of authority is against it, as pointed out in Louisiana Railroad Co. v. Crossman's Heirs (35 Southern, 784, 785; 111 Louisiana, 611). There a corporate charter empowered the district court to modify the report of commissioners to appraise property, and it was held that this did not give the court authority to increase the amount found by the commissioner. The Supreme Court said:

The views of the courts vary in these (the common-law) States. The weight of the decisions, however, does not sustain the view that it is the intention, in using this word, to enlarge or increase an amount allowed instead of, as expressed in the statute here, "to modify." See word "modify," 20 American and English Encyclopedia of Law, second edition, page 836.

In opinions containing this word the courts have not used it in the sense of completely setting aside the thing to be modified.

The lexicographers define it in the sense of limiting or reducing the thing to be modified in extent or degree.

Although there are some decisions which give to the word, when used in a remedial or civil statute, the meaning of change, vary, substitute, yet I am unable to find a single penal statute in which the word is so interpreted. Indeed it is clear that under the canons of construction a penal statute containing a power to modify a penalty could not be so construed in opposition to the lexicographers and against the plain meaning and common usage of the word, against the rights and interests of the accused.

The word, I think, takes its meaning from its setting, from its association with other words, "to modify, vacate, or set aside."

And of course the rule of ejusdem generis is clearly applicable and requires the conclusion that the word "modify" is of the same general meaning as the word "vacate," or the clause "set aside:" but you do not have to rely upon this familiar rule of construction to reach the conclusion, because the bill as drawn does not leave the use of the word "modify" open to such construction so long as the clause "to modify, vacate, or set aside any sentence, in whole or in part" is associated with the further clause "to direct the execution of such part only of any sentence as has not been vacated or set aside."

This subcommittee, as well as the full committee, has for a majority of its personnel lawyers. In view of the fact that it has been publicly charged that we submitted a bill which would bear this construction that Gen. Ansell charges, I ask, as a favor, that this committee make an affirmative finding upon the question whether the bill is even susceptible of the construction that has been given.

It has been charged that my interest in this bill was not such as to produce subsequent effort to secure the enactment of this legislation.

I spoke in my testimony at the last hearing, I think—if not in my first hearing—of the fact that we were all convinced of the necessity of appellate power, and that we got an appellate review under General Order No. 7 as quickly as possible, and transmitted this legislation as quickly as possible in order to get the action of Congress upon it. Now, it is stated that we abandoned that legislation after we submitted it, and made no effort to urge upon Congress its adoption. I offer in disproof of that statement the following:

(1) I appeared before the House Military Committee on February 5, 1918, and argued as strongly as I could for the enactment of this legislation. About this time I was made legislative liaison officer between the department and the House Military Committee to endeavor, if possible, to expedite the enactment of the necessary war legislation which had been asked of Congress. It must be within the knowledge of the members of that committee that I frequently appeared before the committee urging legislation.

As proof of the unusual efforts that I was making at that time to get something done, I prepared what had not been, I believe, prepared before in the history of the committees, a calendar which would show the progress of enactment of all the war legislation pending before the two committees. There was a House section of that calendar and a Senate section of that calendar. I did that in order that members of the committees to whom I talked could see instantly the status of any particular bill.

The two committees were pleased with the efforts made to advance legislation, and had this calendar which I now place before you printed, and thereafter it constituted the calendar to mark the progress of the bills through the two Houses.

This bill we are discussing was on that calendar and was called to the attention of the committees. The Senate committee never chose to hold a hearing upon it. The House committee did hold a hearing upon it at which I testified, and it was not reported favorably. I do not think they took any action upon it at all.

Meantime General Order No. 7 was working to secure this appellate review. It was reasonably effective to do nearly everything, perhaps, that could have been done under the bill with reference to death, dismissal, and dishonorable discharge cases, and I suppose that the view prevailed that it was no longer as urgent as some other of the war legislation that was taxing the time of Congress. I want to get that thoroughly impressed upon the committee that there was no neglect upon my part, and there never was any foundation for saying that I launched this in bad faith; that I had no confidence in it, and that I abandoned it before Congress.

Senator WARREN. General, Senator Lenroot has to go on the floor and I have to report now for a conference. [Turning to Senator Lenroot:] Are you going to be detained on the floor the balance of the day?

Senator LENROOT. Until Senator Cummins comes back.

Senator WARREN. I think we shall probably have to discontinue now. Shall we go on to-morrow?

(After further informal discussion the subcommittee adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, October 29, 1919, at 10 o'clock a. m.)

ESTABLISHMENT OF MILITARY JUSTICE—PROPOSED AMENDMENT OF THE ARTICLES OF WAR.

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 29, 1919.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to adjournment, in the room of the Committee on Appropriations at 10.30 o'clock a. m., Senator Francis E. Warren presiding.

Present, Senators Warren (chairman) and Lenroot.

STATEMENT OF MAJ. GEN. ENOCH H. CROWDER—Resumed.

Gen. CROWDER. Yesterday I was referring to a charge that my attitude toward the bill to amend section 1199 of the Revised Statutes so as to confer appellate power upon the President respecting findings and sentences of courts-martial, was one of practical abandonment of that legislation. I referred to my efforts to secure that legislation and to my appointment as liaison officer between the department and the committees of Congress to expedite the war legislation, and said that in the course of that work I had prepared a calendar of unfinished business pending before the two Committees on Military Affairs. At the moment I could not lay my hands upon it. I knew that I had brought the document here. It was a document that was printed by Congress, and was used by the committees, and I would like to direct your attention to it. I have the original here. You see in this first part all of the House bills that the War Department was interested in, with these columns showing the progress of each bill toward enactment.

Senator LENROOT. I see.

Gen. CROWDER. Here end the House bills, and the Senate bills are in this part of it, and you will find the progress of each bill in the Senate noted in detail. Here is what appears with respect to the amendment of section 1199, Revised Statutes, "Increasing the revisory powers of the Judge Advocate General and the President." This is simply evidence on the question of whether or not my attitude was one of abandonment of this legislation.

Yesterday Senator Lenroot made some inquiries respecting the effect of the disapproval of findings and sentences of courts-martial by the reviewing authority, and I answered that the effect of disapproval was an acquittal. In order to put the matter beyond any question, I examined the records of the office, with this result:

1. Disapproval of a sentence of a court-martial by the reviewing authority is equivalent to an acquittal of the accused by the court. The following authorities are cited in support of this proposition:

Held, that disapproval of a finding of guilty has the effect of an acquittal. (C 2195, Apr. 4, 1896; 12168, Mar. 10, 1902; 12375, Apr. 23, 1902. Dig. Ops. J. A. G., 1912 Discp. XIV E 9 b (1) (a), p. 564.)

A disapproval of the proceedings of a court-martial by the legal reviewing authority is not a mere expression of disapprobation, but a final determinate act putting an end to such proceedings in the particular case and rendering them entirely nugatory and inoperative: * * *

The effect of the entire disapproval of a conviction or sentence is not merely to annul the same as such, but also to prevent the accruing of any disability, forfeiture, etc., which would have been incidental upon an approval. (Davis, Treatise on the Mil. Law of the U. S., pp. 201, 202.)

Where the entire sentence is disapproved, the proceedings in the case are wholly terminated and nugatory: * * *. Upon such a disapproval also the accused is restored ex vi to his normal legal status as existing before his arrest, and is entitled to be at once released from any form of restraint to which he may have been subjected, and to be returned to the duties and rights of his rank and office; his legal rights and privileges remaining no more affected than if the trial had resulted in an acquittal. (Winthrop, Mil. Law and Prec., 2d ed., Vol. I, p. 690.)

The uniform practice of the Government seems to have been to regard such action (disapproval of a sentence) by the reviewing officer as tantamount to an acquittal by the court itself, and it can not be doubted that such is the effect of the order of the reviewing authority in this case. (13 Ops. Atty. Gen., 459, 460.)

I thought I would like to introduce that.

Senator LENROOT. Yes, we are very glad to have that.

Gen. CROWDER. I think this is an appropriate time to state the view of the committee of the American Bar Association upon this question of a military court of appeals, and first I would like to state how that committee came to be appointed.

On January 4, 1919, there appeared in the Associated Press dispatches, published widely, a statement by Judge Page, the president of the American Bar Association, following a meeting of the executive committee of that association, that the present military code was archaic, unworthy of the name of law, and Judge Page announced his intention to investigate through a committee appointed by himself. I brought that matter to the attention of the Secretary of War, and told him that I was under an engagement to proceed to Chicago, and address the selective-service boards of that city and of northern Illinois, and also to address the Chicago Bar Association on the following day at luncheon; that probably I would meet Judge Page, and that I wanted his authority to say to Judge Page that the department would welcome the appointment of such a committee, not that I felt very much assured by the circumstance that Judge Page had pronounced a verdict before he had investigated, but because I knew that any committee appointed by him would have to report back to the full bar association; and I had confidence in the judgment of the American Bar Association upon every question that was vital to the issues that had been raised.

I proceeded to Chicago, but I did not meet Judge Page. Later, my recollection is, the Secretary of War addressed to him a letter and asked him to proceed with his investigation, and that in pursuance of that letter Judge Page came to Washington. It is certain that he visited Washington, and called at my office, and we had some discussion about the work that would devolve upon the committee. I did venture to suggest to him the composition of an investigating committee, to this extent, and to this extent only: I said to him in effect that we have six living ex-Secretaries of War, all of them distinguished members of the American Bar Association; three of them Republicans, Mr. Root, Mr. Taft, and Mr. Stimson, and three of them Democrats, Mr. Wright, Mr. Dickinson, and Mr. Garrison; that all of them had an intimate knowledge of the Articles of War, derived from executing the military code in the graver cases that come before the President for his confirming action, and that it seemed to me that one of the six might well be appointed upon the committee, probably as chairman. He made no reply to my suggestion, and afterwards when the committee was appointed, I was a little surprised that this suggestion had not met with favor. I happened to be in New York City when the announcement was made of the personnel of the investigating committee, and I met a gentleman whose name I do not now recall, but who lives in Albany and who has for a long time been secretary of the New York State Bar Association. He told me that he had cooperated with Judge Page in the selection of the committee. I expressed to him my disappointment that one of the ex-Secretaries of War had not been named on the committee, and I shall always remember his reply. It was, in effect, that "We did not want any one of them;" that they were all tarred with the same stick as Army officers.

Beyond that suggestion I took no interest in the personnel of that committee, and I do not know of any other suggestion that was ever made to Judge Page about who should serve on that committee. I was a little surprised when the committee was announced to find out that Judge Page had gone to the State of North Carolina, from whence Gen. Ansell comes, to select one of the members. I certainly should have been embarrassed if he had gone to the State of Missouri, my native State, and selected a member of the bar of that State to act upon that committee.

Senator WARREN. Do you think the Secretary of War suggested any of the names?

Gen. CROWDER. I have talked to the Secretary of War many times on the subject, and I have no reason to believe that he ever made a suggestion as to the personnel of that committee.

Now, I think we must all be coming to the conclusion that the great question which is to be settled here, the question as to which all others are subordinate, is the question of appellate review, and where that appellate power shall be vested. I have studied carefully the report of the bar committee. Referring to Gen. Ansell's brief of November 10, 1917, deducing appellate power in the Judge Advocate General from section 1199, Revised Statutes, and my opposing brief of November 27, 1917, the committee unanimously reported:

It may hardly be necessary for the committee to express an opinion upon this question; yet we are inclined to think, in view of the custom of the Judge Advocate General for many years and the only Federal decision on the subject, the case of Mason in the Circuit Court of the Northern Division of New York, decided by Judges Wallace and Cox, that it would be rather difficult to establish as a matter of law that the use of the word "revise" in section 1199, conferred such an extensive authority as is now asserted by some. (P. 20, A. B. A. Rept.)

In other words, the committee unanimously reported their non-concurrence with Gen. Ansell's contention.

Passing to the consideration of the legislation that should be had to secure adequate appellate review, the following views are expressed:

1. Views of the majority (Bruce, Hinkley, Conboy). The majority quotes with approval the following recommendation of Judge Advocate General Crowder in his letter of March 10, 1919, to the Secretary of War:

Adopt either the amendment to Revised Statutes 1199, proposed by the Secretary of War, January 19, 1918, which covers the ground more completely and more flexibly than the now pending bills—referring to the bill introduced by Senator Chamberlain last winter (S. 5320), among others—and also leaves the final power of ultimate decision in the President as Commander in Chief of the Army; or else adopt the plan embodied in the proposed joint resolution sent to Senator McKellar, February 20, 1919, which allows the President to “correct, change, reverse, or set aside any sentence of a court-martial found by him to have been erroneously adjudged whether by error of law or of fact.” This would supply the needed appellate jurisdiction over court-martial sentences, lacking under existing law, and would place it in the Commander in Chief of the Army, who would normally act on the recommendation of his constituted legal adviser in military matters—the Judge Advocate General.

The majority add the following explanatory comments:

We believe that the reviews provided for should be appeals in every sense of the word on the facts and on the law and that the same general provisions and constitutional limitations should apply in such cases as in appeals from the civil courts. Argument, however, might be limited to the submission of a brief.

On the whole we are of the opinion that the functions of the Judge Advocate General's Department should be advisory rather than judicial, and that sentences should be approved or disapproved and new trials ordered or disallowed by military order rather than by judicial decrees. (P. 46.)

2. Views of the minority (Gregory, Bynum). It would seem that the minority also contemplate reposing the revisory power in the President.

Mr. Gregory says:

The methods now established in the office of the new Judge Advocate General, although administrative, seem to be admirably adapted in most respects to secure an adequate review—

He is referring to General Order No. 7—and if, in addition the President were given revisory power to be exercised within a reasonable period of time over judgments in general courts-martial, decisions of medical retiring and efficiency boards involving dismissals or discharges from service, and other similar bodies, I would think that this was adequate. (Pp. 91-92.)

In another recommendation the minority say that in case of the adoption of their suggested amendments for securing adequate trials and the President's revisory power, they would not favor any court of review beyond what they contemplate in the Judge Advocate General's office.

That if the amendments herein suggested, for the purpose of securing adequate trial in a general court, and the President's revisory power shall be adopted, with provisions for appeal when the judgment is against the accused, such appeal not ordinarily suspending execution of sentence, then, in my judgment, it would hardly be necessary to provide by law for automatic review in the Judge Advocate General's office of every case and that it should be binding, leaving that to the discretion of the President as Commander in Chief of the Army; nor to constitute further than is here contemplated a court of review as provided for in section 52 in the pending bill. (P. 93.)

I admit that it is difficult to reconcile these quoted views of the minority with the following language which I find in the minority report:

That the defendant should have a right of appeal, where the judgment was against him, to some board of review or similar tribunal, constituted in the Judge Advocate General's department, which board of appeal or board of review should have the right to modify, affirm, or reverse the judgment of the court, and also to grant a new trial; that this should be independent of and in addition to the so-called automatic review of judgments of courts-martial now carried on in the department of the Judge Advocate General, but that so far as practicable where an appeal was taken these functions should be exercised concurrently and by the same board. (P. 95.)

But by reading this last language in connection with the language quoted from pages 91 and 96, supra, I reached the conclusion that what is meant in recommending a board of appeal or board of review is not that this board of appeal or review should be invested by statute with independent power, but that such board should be administratively established in the Judge Advocate General's department as an advisory agency to the President.

So understanding the minority recommendations, it would seem that, however they may differ in other respects and in lesser details—differences quite to be expected from independent minds—the members of the committee do not differ on the subject of appellate review. This very able and distinguished committee, representative of the bar of the country, after examination and study of the subject, appear to be unanimous in opinion upon the essentials, namely, that the law has not clothed the Judge Advocate General with appellate power; that revisory control of courts-martial should not be divorced from military authority; that legislation should provide additional appellate and revisory power; and that all such power should be lodged within the Army itself, to be exercised, in one form or another, by the President, as Commander in Chief, upon the advice of the Judge Advocate General and his office. Between that message from the committee of the Bar Association and my own expressed views there is no disagreement.

Senator WARREN. General, I think I have seen in this evidence the opinion of at least one witness, or the accusation, that this committee was a committee hand picked by the War Department.

Gen. CROWDER. Yes.

Senator WARREN. Are we to assume from your testimony that you do not agree with that?

Gen. CROWDER. I have stated all the "hand picking" that there was, so far as I was concerned. It was my single suggestion that one out of six of the living ex-Secretaries of War, because of their experience in applying the code, should be named upon the committee.

Senator WARREN. But that suggestion was not taken?

Gen. CROWDER. That suggestion was not taken; and that is the only suggestion that I ever made; and to that extent, and to that extent only, am I guilty of the charge of helping to hand pick the committee.

Senator LENROOT. And the attitude of Judge Page was rather adverse to your view?

Gen. CROWDER. Yes. Senator Lenroot, in the course of my examination, asked me if I was going to speak of the four death cases in France, and I said yes, at a later period I intended to refer to them. In respect of these four death cases I have to answer the charge of Gen. Ansell that—

The whole military hierarchy, capped by your Chief of Staff and the Judge Advocate General of the Army, who is not independent of the Chief of Staff, clamored and entered into an agreement that these men should die. (P. 149.)

Who the rest of the military hierarchy were, with whom the Chief of Staff and myself were in agreement, is not expressly stated. Presumably it is another of those frequent exaggerations which we find throughout Gen. Ansell's testimony.

I have also to reply to the following allegation appearing in the Congressional Record of January 27, 1919, page 4639:

What can be said of a Judge Advocate General, the highest judicial officer in the system itself, who pleads for a united front upon the part of all interested in the maintenance of discipline that innocent men may be sent to their doom as sacrifices to discipline?

On pages 134 and 135 Gen. Ansell gives a description of the four death cases from France—two for sleeping on post and two for disobedience of an order to get their equipment and to drill. All four cases came up from the division commanded by Lieut. Gen. Bullard.

In all four cases there was a finding of guilty and the imposition of the death sentence; likewise a letter of Gen. Pershing that accompanied the records and a copy of which will be found on page 141 of the record of these hearings. Gen. Pershing's letter was directed to me and urged upon me the view that there was a military necessity for the execution of these sentences, saying that he regarded the two soldiers who willfully disobeyed orders without excuse or extenuation as more deserving of the extreme penalty than the two who slept on post. He concluded his letter by saying: "I recommend the execution of the sentences in these cases in the belief that it is a military necessity and that it will diminish the number of like cases that may arise in the future."

I had anticipated that the world war would not proceed very far until we had to deal with the execution of the death sentence coming up from the theater of war and I thought I knew the temper of the American people well enough to anticipate that only in case of the most urgent necessity would public opinion sustain the execution of the death sentence. I also appreciated the grave responsibility which would be assumed if, here in the War Department, we undertook to dictate as to the discipline of the Army in the theater of war.

We knew the lenient policy that Lincoln pursued. Speaking from the experience of that war, it was easily to be seen that there was the greatest responsibility incurred by the Secretary of War and the President in disagreeing with the commanding general of a field army and the commanding general of the American Expeditionary Forces, as to what was necessary in the enforcement of discipline in its command, especially during the period of fighting battles.

When the four death cases from France reached the office, I sent them to the best criminal lawyer we had in the office, Maj.—later Col.—Rand, whose position at the New York bar is well known to each member of this committee. He was the assistant of Mr. Jerome in the trial of a great many criminal cases.

He reported that the record was legally sufficient and recommended the execution of the death sentences.

They were sent back to him for rewriting, as it was thought that he had dealt with them too summarily. The records were sent to a number of other officers for report. I do not remember their names. I would not undertake to say how many were called in conference on these cases, but the facts have been given to this committee by Col. Davis and Col. Clark in their testimony at the February hearings. I can speak only as to my own state of mind. I never knew that my attitude, which was for clemency from the beginning, was questioned by anyone, until Sunday, January 19, 1919, when I read an article published in that day's edition of the New York World entitled "The thing we call military justice," a copy of which I can hand the committee, and in which it was reported, in effect, that my attitude in this case was in favor of the execution of this penalty.

I read that article on Sunday. On Monday morning I sent for Gen. Ansell and asked him if he had read the article. He said that he had glanced at it. I invited his attention to the fact that I was accused in that article of entering into an agreement with other officers to secure an approval of these sentences, and asked him if he could state from recollection what my attitude was. He replied that in substance he could; that he remembered distinctly my coming to his room, very much worried about these cases, and expressing that worry to him and asking him if he would not take the cases and write a review of them. I did not pursue the matter further, except to say, in substance, "Thank you. I am glad your recollection accords with my own," and I was greatly surprised later, in an issue of the Congressional Record, which I think was that of February 19, to find it inferentially stated there to the public by Gen. Ansell that he had been compelled to resort to a communication to the White House through a distinguished member of the House Judiciary Committee to get the attention of the President in these cases in order to stop a concerted action in the War Department, of which I was a part, to take the lives of these men.

Now, in the course of his testimony before this committee Gen. Ansell, using quotation marks, attributes to me the following language, which he says I used in a note, or two notes, to the Chief of Staff. First, he represents me as saying:

I have got the four death cases from France. They are cases in which the commanding general in France is very much interested and is insisting upon the execution of the death penalty. I think it would be very unfortunate, indeed, if the War Department did not have one mind about these cases and agree to uphold the hands of Gen. Pershing. (P. 137.)

Again:

We ought to agree to uphold the hands of the commanding general, regardless of the merits. (P. 137.)

Then again:

We ought to agree to support the hands of Gen. Pershing in these cases. (P. 137.)

And again:

I recommend that these men die. (P. 137.)

Again:

I think you ought to be acquainted with these additional facts which I have discovered subsequently to my first interview; but understand, when I submit this memorandum to you, I do it with no desire to reopen this case. (P. 138.)

And again:

While these facts suggest clemency, nevertheless I do not recommend it. Gen. Pershing, of course, would feel that we had not supported him, and I sympathize with his view. (P. 138.)

Later, Senator Chamberlain and Senator Lenroot asked that these notes that I had written the Chief of Staff be put in the record. They were put in the record. Now, gentlemen, the language that I have read to you, that Gen. Ansell attributes to me, is not to be found in the notes. I ask for an examination of them.

Senator WARREN. These notes as they appear in the record (pp. 141, 145-147), are correct?

Gen. CROWDER. These notes, as they appear in the record, to the Chief of Staff. But this language that I have read to you here, all except just a phrase here and there that has no significance in representing my attitude toward the case, does not appear in the notes. It is his own deduction.

Senator WARREN. You allude to what appears in the testimony?

Gen. CROWDER. I have right here what appears in the testimony before this committee, and then I have in a parallel column the notes I actually sent. Now, his statement passed unchallenged before this committee, that I said what he attributes to me.

I want to state to the committee what actually happened.

Senator LENROOT. You are going into the notes?

Gen. CROWDER. Yes.

Senator LENROOT. Very well; I will not ask the question I was going to ask.

Gen. CROWDER. My first note to Gen. March was sent before I submitted any review on the case at all, and I asked for an interview, and in that very first note I suggested clemency for these men; but I was of the opinion that Gen. March, fresh from the battle fields of Europe, would have a better judgment about the situation than I would have, and I did say to him that it would be unfortunate if we had a divided opinion upon this subject, contemplating always that Gen. March might come to my view. I went up to Gen. March with the cases in my hand, but without a recommendation, and he said in effect that he did have knowledge of battle-field conditions over there, and likewise, I think he said, some knowledge of these specific cases—that he had heard them discussed; and he went on to give me the reasons why he thought Gen. Pershing's recommendation should be sustained, and that there should be an approval.

Backed as I was at that time with the opinion of several officers that the record was legally sufficient to sustain the findings, and also with Gen. Pershing's very unusual and emphatic recommendation that the sentences should be carried into execution, and with Gen. March's pronounced view that they should be carried into execution, I went back to the office and completed the review with this remark:

I recommend that the sentence be confirmed and carried into execution. With this in view there is herewith inclosed for your signature a letter transmitting the record to the President for his action thereon, together with an executive order designed to carry this recommendation into effect, should such action meet with your approval.

And so the cases were submitted in that form. I found that my mind was not at rest on the subject, and I sought an interview with the Secretary of War.

Senator LENROOT. About what date was that recommendation? There does not seem to be any date in the record.

Gen. CROWDER. April 5, 1918, was the date that I wrote my first letter to Gen. March, in which I used this language. That was before I had submitted the cases. I asked for an interview, and I said, "There is a very large question in my mind as to whether clemency should be extended." That was my first attitude, before I had consulted with Gen. March. Then I went up and had this interview, and later on I appended to the review, after my interview with Gen. March, what I have just read to you, by way of final action on the cases.

Senator LENROOT. On the same day?

Gen. CROWDER. I do not remember, but probably, yes.

Then I went to see the Secretary of War about the cases, and I told him about my interview with Gen. March, and that my mind was not at rest on the subject, and that I did feel that we ought to have the kind of conference that would relieve the President from the necessity of dealing with a divided recommendation. The Secretary of War was receptive, from the start, to clemency in these cases.

I followed up that interview with the Secretary of War with two other interviews direct upon this question of clemency. My whole purpose was to get the War Department to act as a unit on these cases, and believing all the time that we would have to do the rather unusual thing of overruling Gen. Pershing in this matter.

The attitude of the Secretary of War toward these two cases continually strengthened in the direction of clemency, and I recall with some definiteness, when I was talking with him about the embarrassment that would come from overruling the commanding general in the field, that he replied in effect "That is a responsibility I am prepared to take in a proper case."

There never was any necessity for anybody to go direct to the President to stop a concerted action upon the part of officials of the War Department to secure the approval of the death sentences in these cases, and I know of no subject connected with this controversy concerning which there has been so much misrepresentation of the attitude of individuals as there has been in this particular matter.

I wish to put into the evidence, if I may, these parallel columns, which show what I am charged with saying, and show exactly what I did say, in order that anybody by glancing at the parallel columns may find out whether there was any justification for the statement before this committee that I used this extreme language, or that my attitude is correctly stated when they say that I entered into an agreement with the Chief of Staff to secure the execution of the death sentences in these cases.

Inaccuracies of statement are nowhere better illustrated than in what Gen. Ansell says about these four death cases from France.

GEN. ANSELL'S TESTIMONY.

I have got the four death cases from France. They are cases in which the commanding general in France is very much interested and is insisting upon the execution of the death penalty. I think it would be very unfortunate, indeed, if the War Department did not have one mind about these cases and agree to uphold the hands of Gen. Pershing. (P. 137.)

We ought to agree to uphold the hands of the commanding general, regardless of of the merits. (P. 137.)

We ought to agree to support the hands of Gen. Pershing in these cases. (P. 137.)

GEN. CROWDER'S MEMORANDUM OF APRIL 5, 1918, TO CHIEF OF STAFF.

APRIL 5, 1918.

MY DEAR GEN. MARCH: Here are the four cases from France involving the death sentence—two for sleeping on post and two for disobedience of orders. I regret that the reviews have been so long delayed, but I have had to go outside of the records for relevant facts.

The first paper that will encounter your attention is a brief memorandum prepared by the officer charged with the study of these cases, which will give you a survey of all four cases and will prepare you for a quick reading and understanding of the review prepared by this office in each case.

You will notice that I have not finished the review by embodying a definite recommendation.

It would be unfortunate, indeed, if the War Department did not have one mind about these cases. There is no question that the records are legally sufficient to sustain the findings and sentence. There is a very large question in my mind as to whether clemency should be extended. Undoubtedly Gen. Pershing will think, if we extend clemency, that we have not sustained him in a matter in which he has made a very explicit recommendation.

May we have a conference at any early date?

E. H. CROWDER,
Judge Advocate General.

Maj. Gen. PEYTON C. MARCH,
Chief of Staff.

CONCLUSION, GEN. CROWDER'S REVIEW OF CASES.

I recommend that these men die. (P. 137.)

The court was lawfully constituted. The proceedings were regular. The record discloses no errors. The findings and sentence are supported by the record and are authorized by law.

I recommend that the sentence be confirmed and carried into execution. With this in view, there is herewith inclosed for your signature a letter transmitting the record to the President for his action thereon, together with an Executive order designed to carry this recommendation into effect, should such action meet with your approval.

E. H. CROWDER,
Judge Advocate General.

GEN. CROWDER'S MEMORANDUM OF APRIL
16, 1918, TO CHIEF OF STAFF.

I think you ought to be acquainted with these additional facts which I have discovered subsequently to my first interview; but, understand, when I submit this memorandum to you, I do it with no desire to reopen this case. (P. 138.)

While these facts suggest clemency, nevertheless I do not recommend it. Gen. Pershing, of course, would feel that we had not supported him, and I sympathize with his view. (P. 138.)

1. Since our interview on the four cases from France involving the death sentence, at which interview we agreed that we would submit the cases with a recommendation that the sentences be carried into execution, my attention has been invited to certain facts of which I had no knowledge at the time of the interview and to which I think your attention should have been invited.

* * * * *

4. Permit me finally to observe, without reopening the case, that it will always be a matter of regret to me that the four cases upon which we are called upon to act were not well tried. The composition of the court in Ledoyen's case consisted of one colonel, one major, and four first lieutenants. The four first lieutenants could have had but little experience. The same court that tried Ledoyen tried Fishback. The court that tried Cook was composed of the same members, except a captain (doubtless of considerable experience), and a first lieutenant (presumably of little experience); and the same court that tried Cook tried Sebastian.

We have discussed the fact that each of the four defendants was a mere youth, and I am a little impressed by the fact that not one of them made any fight for his life. Each of the four men was defended by a second lieutenant, who made no special plea for them. I regret exceedingly that in each case the accused was allowed to make a plea of guilty. As counsel for them I should have strongly advised that they plead not guilty and require the Government to maintain its case at every point.

It will not have escaped your notice that Gen. Pershing has no office of review in these cases. He seems to have required that these cases be sent to him for the purpose of putting on the record an expression of his view that all four men should be placed before a firing squad. I do not make this statement for the purpose of criticizing his action. Indeed, I sympathize with it. But it is fair, in the consideration of the action to be taken here, to bear in mind the fact that Gen. Pershing was not functioning as a reviewing officer with any official relation to the prosecution, but as commanding general anxious to maintain the discipline of his command.

E. H. CROWDER,
Judge Advocate General.

Senator LENROOT. If you are through with that, I would like to ask you a few questions on the notes.

Gen. CROWDER. Yes.

Senator LENROOT. With reference to the first note, where you say, "There is a very large question in my mind as to whether clemency should be extended," you wish the committee to understand that what you had in mind there was a suggestion of clemency? Is that it?

Gen. CROWDER. That is exactly what I want you to understand.

Senator LENROOT. Of course, the ordinary construction would be rather the contrary, would it not?

Gen. CROWDER. No, I do not think so; but I will admit that it is not as clear a phraseology as I could have employed.

Senator LENROOT. To be perfectly frank with you, it struck me upon reading it, death sentences being the exception rather than the rule, that the suggestion there, in that language, "There is a very large question in my mind as to whether clemency should be extended," did not imply, merely from the reading of the language, a suggestion of clemency.

Gen. CROWDER. Of course, I could have chosen clearer language, had I thought that my attitude as to clemency in this case would ever have been assailed. But, Senator, how could there have been any misunderstanding when you consider my note along with the Pershing letter recommending that the sentences be executed, and the recommendation of Gen. Bullard that the sentences be executed. They favored executing the death penalty. I was raising this new question of clemency, and certainly I was not raising it for the purpose of agreeing with them. So that I do not think that my note, in connection with what it was transmitting for the attention of the Secretary of War, could have been in the least open to this most obvious misconstruction.

Senator LENROOT. Then, at the time of the making of the recommendation itself, what review had been had, or what study had been had, of the facts in these cases?

Gen. CROWDER. First, by Col. Rand, whose qualifications to make the study I have referred to.

Senator LENROOT. Do you know what this study consisted of? Was it more than an examination of the record itself?

Gen. CROWDER. It could not have been any more than that, because it was all the opportunity he had to acquaint himself with the facts.

Senator LENROOT. Then how did the additional facts come to you? That is really what I am leading up to.

Gen. CROWDER. I went back to the office and asked an officer to go up to The Adjutant General's office and ascertain for me the ages of these boys. That was not in the record. I wanted to know how old they were and how long they had served, and what opportunities they had had to learn their duties as sentinels and as soldiers generally; and, aliunde of the record, I got that information.

Then I directed another officer to examine all the cases that had come in from France to see if there were other instances of trial for disobedience of orders and for sleeping on post, and what the sentences had been, and I got that information; and on the basis of that information I became more and more aggressive in claiming clemency for these men, because I found that there were two of them, I think, under 19, and the other two were under 20 years of age, and that all of them had had less than a year's service, and all of them were volunteers.

Senator LENROOT. Then you found some other facts with reference to acquittals of some other charge of a like offense?

Gen. CROWDER. Not acquittals, as I remember it, but very minor sentences, and some instances where the same offense had been tried by special court.

Senator LENROOT. Was there one case where one of the boys involved in the very same transaction was acquitted? As I remember, there was in your review of the facts.

Gen. CROWDER. May I ask you to restate that?

Senator LENROOT. Was there one case where one of the boys——

Senator WARREN. One of the four?

Senator LENROOT. No; not one of the four, but involved at the same time—was acquitted?

Gen. CROWDER. I do not recall that.

Senator LENROOT. Perhaps my recollection is wrong, but I thought I remembered where, in your review of April 10, you cited one case where there was a man named Hindman. Do you recollect?

Gen. CROWDER. No; I do not recollect.

Senator LENROOT. Oh, yes; here it is. On page 144 of this record; William Hindman. The record says:

This soldier was accused of sleeping on post in the front trenches on the night of November 5-6. This is the same night that Pvt. Cook, who was convicted, is alleged to have committed a like offense.

Neither one of those two is one of the four, is that correct?

Gen. CROWDER. May I glance at that page?

Senator LENROOT. Here it is.

Gen. CROWDER (after examining page 144 of the record). No.

Senator LENROOT. That has nothing to do with any of these four in these cases!

Gen. CROWDER. No; I do not think so.

Senator LENROOT. Then, what have you to say as to the reviewing officer or the court itself, in extreme sentences of this kind, not supplying for the record these very pertinent facts that you afterwards discovered?

Gen. CROWDER. The failure to do so has got to be charged up, it seems to me, to the exigencies of the battle field and of the zone of active operations. I do not like to think that it is possible that a death sentence should come up here for review upon a record which failed to show many things which were necessary to be shown of record to form the judgment of the confirming authority respecting the action finally to be taken. I had a little less severe condemnation of that after reading a corresponding record which has been placed in evidence before this committee, in the British service. It is, if anything, more meager than the records in these four cases, and the man who was tried and convicted was not allowed to live more than 48 hours, when he was executed. There are two such cases in the record before you, of corresponding trials by the field court-martial of the British Army, placed in evidence by Col. Rigby. I supposed that a man like Rand and a man like Wigmore, who also made a study of these sentences, would comment on the very point that you have brought out, but they appeared to be willing to concede something to the exigencies of the battle field, and to the judgment of men on the ground, and it always entered into my head in passing judgment upon that phase of the situation that as good a soldier as Gen. Bullard and as good a judge advocate as Col. Winship, who was upon his staff, appeared to be satisfied with the evidence in the case.

Senator LENROOT. Nevertheless, General, would you not say that it was a most unfortunate condition of affairs where a death sentence inflicted for the purpose of discipline—because that was the primary purpose of the extreme sentence—should be inflicted without the record containing full facts in connection with it?

Gen. CROWDER. I hope we will have very few such cases to deal with in the future.

Senator LENROOT. Did it occur to you and the other reviewing authorities that for a death sentence there had been no adequate and proper defense here of these boys?

Gen. CROWDER. I think we all regretted, and I expressed that regret in my note, that the cases had not been more adequately presented. The only pause that I had in the matter, Senator, was the positive recommendation of such soldiers as Gen. Bullard and Gen. Pershing.

Senator LENROOT. Well, are we to understand from that, General, that for the sake of enforcing discipline you were willing to rather give less weight to the rights of an accused than you otherwise would?

Gen. CROWDER. No; I could not have entertained that view but for the judgment of these distinguished lawyers from civil life, with which I ultimately concurred, that the record was in itself legally sufficient to sustain the findings and sentences. Here we were sitting, 3,000 miles away from the field of action, matching our judgments against the men with as high or higher responsibility, who were in close contact with all the facts, and the situation that had to be dealt with. Here was the judgment of two distinguished lawyers, at least, from civil life, that the record was sufficient; and now you have before you those two records of the field general courts-martial of England, which show that they also had to execute men upon that kind of a record.

Senator LENROOT. Of course it will be conceded by everyone that legally the record was sufficient, I suppose; and yet the very meagerness of the record, and what did appear upon the record, while from a legal standpoint it was sufficient, might have suggested to anyone, it seems to me, that these men ought not to be executed without further ascertainment of facts.

Gen. CROWDER. My position was this, and let me be held responsible for it, that I would make this fight before the Chief of Staff, and that I would make it before the Secretary of War, but that I would not go against their judgment and complicate the matter before the President of the United States. That was my position. I made the fight before the Chief of Staff; I made the fight before the Secretary of War, in behalf of these men; but it was not necessary to go before the President with a divided opinion except in so far as Gen. March differed from the Secretary of War and myself on those cases.

Senator LENROOT. Now, one further question. This note of yours, following the conference, did contain the unqualified recommendation that the sentence be carried out?

Gen. CROWDER. Please remember that when I wrote that note I had not the facts aliunde of the record.

Senator LENROOT. Yes; you got these additional facts outside of the record?

Gen. CROWDER. Yes.

Senator LENROOT. And on April 16 you wrote Gen. March another letter?

Gen. CROWDER. Yes.

Senator LENROOT. Containing all of these facts?

Gen. CROWDER. Yes.

Senator LENROOT. But there was no suggestion in this letter of a change in recommendation, upon your part, was there?

Gen. CROWDER. No explicit change of recommendation; but the whole effect of the letter was to suggest to him a lack of finality in the first recommendation.

Senator LENROOT. The language is:

Since our interview on the four cases from France involving the death sentence, at which interview we agreed that we would submit the cases with a recommendation that the sentences be carried into execution, my attention has been invited to certain facts of which I had no knowledge at the time of the interview and to which I think your attention should have been invited.

Gen. CROWDER. Yes.

Senator LENROOT. Then you go on with the facts. But is there any suggestion in your letter that so far as your final recommendation is concerned, you desired to change it?

Gen. CROWDER. Not unless you can read that into the letter. I did not use——

Senator LENROOT. From the submission of the facts, yes?

Gen. CROWDER. I had some motive for doing it.

Senator LENROOT. Oh, yes; certainly.

Gen. CROWDER. I know my own state of mind. I know the embarrassment to a President, of divided opinion in a grave matter, and all my effort was to get one view of this case so as to simplify the President's problem in passing upon the case; I conferred with the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff and consulted officers in my own department, always with the idea that the clemency view would prevail, and saving to myself a position in the case where I would not bring about this state of divided opinion before the President.

Senator LENROOT. Now, this was dated April 16, 1918. What next occurred, so far as you are concerned with it?

Gen. CROWDER. Nothing further occurred except some interviews with the Secretary of War, three in all, the dates of which I can not remember well enough to put them into the record. Whether they followed this letter or not I would not like to say positively, but I am sure that until the Secretary of War finally acted I kept up my conferences with him for the purpose of seeing that he had assumed 100 per cent responsibility for final action upon the case.

Senator LENROOT. Upon what point, as you remember, or as nearly as you remember, did you explicitly change your view with reference to carrying out the sentence, in conversations with the Secretary of War?

Gen. CROWDER. I never had to change my views. I had only to deal with this statement that I have made here in the record; first, of recommending clemency or suggesting clemency; second, submitting the case for execution, after a conference with the Chief of Staff; and then, third, bringing these additional facts to his attention, my mind being always in one attitude toward the case, but always subordinating an expression of that view to what was the ultimate and combined judgment of the War Department as to the necessities of the situation as interpreted by the commanding general of the American Expeditionary Forces in France.

Senator LENROOT. But, General, must there not have been at some point a changed attitude upon your part? Because after this conference, you did formally make the recommendation that the sentence be executed.

Gen. CROWDER. Yes; after the first conference.

Senator LENROOT. Now, after that——

Gen. CROWDER. The next day.

Senator LENROOT. Yes; and after that, you must, to the Secretary of War, it seems to me, have expressed a reversal of your formal recommendation.

Gen. CROWDER. In every one of these three interviews I expressed to him this view that I had, which I would have carried out if it were not for the necessity of coordinating action of the War Department in these grave matters. It was not a question of law upon which I was expected to speak an independent word. It was a question of clemency. If it had been a question of law, it would have been a different matter; I should not have consulted with the Chief of Staff or any military man respecting the legal view. But this was purely a question of clemency, a question that the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff have as much to do with as the Judge Advocate General.

Senator LENROOT. Then, do I understand that so far as clemency itself was concerned, you took no part in it, or assumed no responsibility for it, except the bringing of the additional facts, subsequent to your formal recommendation, to the attention of the Chief of Staff and the Secretary of War?

Gen. CROWDER. In both written and oral interviews.

Senator LENROOT. Yes.

Gen. CROWDER. That is true, and I do not know how I could have——

Senator LENROOT. But you at no time changed your view as to the carrying out or execution of the sentence? In other words, you are willing to stand upon your formal recommendation as originally made?

Gen. CROWDER. I never withdrew that recommendation.

Senator LENROOT. That is what I am getting at.

Gen. CROWDER. I never withdrew it, but the Secretary of War has had my personal view as to my personal desire to see him overrule the recommendation.

Senator WARREN. Let me ask a question a little aside from this line, if I may interrupt.

Senator LENROOT. Certainly.

Senator WARREN. As to this question of capital punishment, a question that is very much discussed and differently administered—that is, the sentences for capital punishment—many believing that there should be no such thing as capital punishment: Do you recommend that the final punishment of death for certain offenses in the Army should be done away with entirely—capital punishment entirely abandoned and eliminated from the Articles of War?

Gen. CROWDER. I know of no offense denounced and punished by death in the military code as it exists to-day where the death penalty can be properly abrogated. We cut it down somewhat in the revision of 1916.

Senator WARREN. But you believe that finally there should be a specific law providing that certain cases should proceed to that end?

Gen. CROWDER. Do I believe what?

Senator WARREN. That there should be, in the finality, certain crimes—if I may allude to them as crimes—some offenses, for which the death penalty should be pronounced and executed? You do not believe in abrogating capital punishment in the Army?

Gen. CROWDER. Oh, no; it is impossible.

Senator WARREN. When I think of the Army, I am reminded of the times when I used to stand guard myself as a private soldier, where we were likely to be picked off by the enemy, any time; and I know how hard it is for a boy 16 or 17 years old to keep awake, unless there is something that scares the very life out of him, to keep him interested.

Senator LENROOT. If I understand your attitude, it is that so far as you were personally concerned, you were from the beginning in favor of clemency, but that you desired united action upon the part of all those who were responsible, and that you made this formal recommendation for the carrying out of the sentence, but you would have been glad if Gen. March would have been willing, and the Secretary of War had been willing, to recommend clemency. But if they were unwilling to do that, you were willing to assume your share of the responsibility, leaving the original notes to stand?

Gen. CROWDER. That is correct; but if you will allow me to put in there, that the duties of the Judge Advocate General in a case of that kind are two-fold. One is to pass upon the legality and regularity of the record; its freedom from prejudicial error or reversible error or jurisdictional error. In that field he has an undivided responsibility in which it would be rarely justifiable for him to consult with any military authority.

The second is the duty in regard to clemency, where there was a necessity of coordinating action and of establishing a policy which would govern during the period of the war. It was on that side and that side alone that I sought conferences with superior authority, and the motive that I had in every conference conducted was to bring about clemency, if we could without detriment to the efficiency of our fighting forces, in a matter where Gen. Bullard and Gen. Pershing had placed themselves on record in favor of a specific action. Now, if it be a crime for the Judge Advocate General on that side of his duties, where coordination is necessary, to consult with a superior authority, I am that criminal. I never consulted with them on the ground of the sufficiency of the record. I did consult with them on the ground of the degree of clemency that should be extended in this case, and I never had but one attitude of mind toward it, that I was not willing to make the President's duty more difficult because of any view that I had on the subject that arrayed itself against the view of the Secretary of War, the Chief of Staff, Gen. Pershing, and Gen. Bullard. Now, I hope I have made my position thoroughly clear there, so that hereafter nobody will be able to misunderstand my position. It is very important, if I understand it, to keep in mind that on one side of my duties I had an undivided responsibility which I could not share with anybody, while on the other side I had a divided responsibility.

Senator LENROOT. Did Gen. March make a recommendation similar to your formal recommendation?

Gen. CROWDER. Yes.

Senator LENROOT. What other recommendations were there—aside from Gen. Pershing's, I mean; I mean here in the department?

Gen. CROWDER. The cases went before the President and the Secretary of War with my recommendation and Gen. March's recommendation, and of course with the recommendations which had been made of record, of Gen. Bullard and Gen. Pershing.

Senator LENROOT. Yes.

Gen. CROWDER. Then, as the result of this further study that I made, simply because my mind was not at rest upon this question of clemency, there was a further report submitted by me in which I had used very largely the reports submitted by Gen. Ansell, Col. Clark, and perhaps Col. Davis also, who cooperated, getting up these additional facts.

Senator LENROOT. But, in the first place, the formal recommendations, so far as those in the department here were concerned, were those of Gen. March and yourself to the Secretary of War?

Gen. CROWDER. Yes.

Senator LENROOT. And if Gen. March had looked upon it as you did, instead of your making the recommendation for carrying out the recommendation of the sentence, it would have been just the reverse?

Gen. CROWDER. Yes; if I had secured agreement.

Senator LENROOT. So that, did you rather yield in that respect to Gen. March's judgment in order to secure agreement?

Gen. CROWDER. I yielded to the judgment of a man fresh from the battlefields.

Senator LENROOT. Yes; but I am referring to the fact.

Gen. CROWDER. On the question of clemency only.

Senator LENROOT. Yes, I understand.

Gen. CROWDER. Not on any duty that devolved on me as the Judge Advocate General. But on the question of clemency I went to him, because he was but recently from there; and I found out that he had discussed these cases before he left France.

Senator LENROOT. That is all.

Gen. CROWDER. There is one other matter, before I proceed with the discussion of the pending bill. I represented to you yesterday that the English war department had sought by admonition to regulate punishments and to control sentences of courts-martial. I have this morning to bring to your attention their standing regulation on the subject, which is paragraph 583, subheading XI, of their King's Regulations, corresponding roughly to our Army Regulations. [Reading:]

The following general instructions are issued for the guidance of courts-martial, but nothing contained in them must be construed as limiting the discretion of the court to pass any legal sentence, whether in accordance with these instructions or not, if in their opinion there is good reason for doing so.

And then follows a list of punishments that they think appropriate. That was before the war came on.

In 1917 I find that they issued the following order to the British armies in France. This order was issued by Field Marshal Haig, January 1, 1917. [Reading:]

[Extracts from general route orders issued to the British armies in France by Field Marshal Haig, Jan. 1, 1917.]

COURTS-MARTIAL—GENERAL INSTRUCTIONS.

The commander in chief has had under consideration certain sentences recently awarded by courts-martial. It would be improper for him to interfere in any way with the discretion of a court-martial as to the sentence to be awarded, but, at the same time, he is of opinion that the unequal sentences awarded by courts-martial for similar crimes show that many officers do not sufficiently appreciate the precise quality of the offenses with which they have to deal.

He wishes to point out that certain offenses which in peace time are adequately met by a small sentence, assume, on active service, a gravity which wholly alters their character.

This principle is fully recognized in military law; for instance, in the case of desertion, the army act in time of peace permits a maximum sentence of two years' duration only, whereas on active service a court is allowed to award a sentence of death for the same offense. Similar considerations apply to cases of looting and to other offenses specified in sections 4 and 6, army act.

The commander in chief wishes to impress upon all officers serving upon courts-martial that it is their duty to give weight to considerations of good character, inexperience, and all other extenuating circumstances, but that, at the same time, they are seriously to consider the effect which the offense in question may have upon the discipline of the Army, upon which its safety and success depend, and if they come to the conclusion that a sentence, however severe, is necessary in the interests of discipline, no feeling of commiseration for the individual must deter them from carrying out their duty.

Upon my return to the office of the Judge Advocate General last January, I got out the following instruction. This was after the armistice. [Reading:]

GENERAL ORDER JANUARY 22, 1919—MAXIMUM PUNISHMENTS.

In view of the cessation of hostilities and the reestablishment of conditions approximating those of peace within the territorial limits of the United States, the propriety of observing limitations upon the punishing powers of courts-martial as established by Executive order of December 15, 1916, is obvious. Where in exceptional cases a court-martial adjudges and a reviewing authority approves punishments in excess of the limits described in said Executive order, the reasons for so doing will be made a matter of record. Trial by general court-martial within the territorial limits stated will be ordered only where the punishment that might be imposed by a special or summary court or by the commanding officer under the provisions of the 104th article of war would be under all circumstances of the case clearly inadequate.

Now, I told you that I got a part of the verbiage of that order from an order that had been prepared by the chief of the military justice division of my office in the summer of 1918, and submitted to Gen. Ansell in September of that year, which had been sent back for further revision and study, and was not published. Of course at that time no reference could have been made to the cessation of hostilities, but a reference could have been made to conditions here in the United States approximating those of peace, where the severer punishments, including the death penalty, were not necessary, and in that way an admonition could have gone to the Army which, I think, as I said yesterday, would have been productive of greater uniformity of sentence, and would have defeated many of the excessive sentences that were adjudged in this country.

Senator LENROOT. Was that an order signed by the President?

Gen. CROWDER. It was issued by his authority. Those statements cover all the matter necessary to connect up with the testimony heretofore offered, and I am ready now to take up the discussion of the pending bill and its application to a hypothetical case.

APPLICATION OF SENATE BILL 64 TO A HYPOTHETICAL CASE.

I think we may best reach an understanding of those sections of the proposed bill which have to do with actual trials before courts-martial by giving those sections a hypothetical application to a specific case; and, because I know that this committee would not report, nor would Congress enact, a bill which would not meet the requirements in the trial of purely military offenses—which I have stated to you constitute about 86 per cent of the cases tried during the war—I shall discuss the application of those sections to such a case, namely—alleged disobedience of a colonel commanding a line regiment, of competent orders to put his regiment into battle—a case where the evidence is primarily tactical or strategical, and wholly military. When I have finished with this typical military offense I shall try to explain the application of the pending bill to the trial of a common-law or statutory felony, which I have told you make up from 8 to 12 per cent of the cases. Let us see what would happen under the proposed bill at the successive stages of the trial of the assumed case of purely military offense, commencing with the preferring of the charge.

PREFERRING OF THE CHARGE.

Under the pending bill the charge would be preferred in the first instance by "a person subject to military law who can make oath that he has actual personal knowledge of the matters set forth in the charge." It will rarely be the case that one such person has all this knowledge. The proposed law takes care of this situation. If such person has not the actual knowledge, or is lacking in knowledge in part, he must personally investigate and make oath on information or belief (art. 18). The charges are duly prepared and forwarded to the brigade commander.

The brigade commander's duties are set forth in article 19. He makes, or causes to be made, a thorough investigation as to the truth of the matters set forth in such charge. The accused is heard in his own behalf and by available witnesses he may offer. In forwarding the charge, the brigade commander must accompany it with statements of the substance of the testimony taken on both sides and all other evidence, including the statement of the accused.

Down to this point, with the exception of the requirements that the signer of the charge must be a "person subject to military law," and, therefore, an officer, enlisted man, or retainer to the camp, who must make oath on actual knowledge, or on information and belief as the result of an investigation made by him, the new procedure is substantially the existing procedure under sections 75 and 76, M. C. M., as modified by C. M. C. M. No. 5, July 14, 1919, and no great embarrassment would result from the enactment of that part of the pending bill.

I shall not object at any stage to the requirement that the man who prefers charges against another shall himself make oath to those charges, either of personal knowledge or upon information and belief. I am not certain that it will serve any useful purpose, I am not certain that it will curtail the number of charges that are preferred, but I am willing to do anything that will give the public confidence in the manner in which trials by court-martial are conducted, and will give them confidence in the fairness of the manner in which officers who are conducting courts-martial are discharging their duties in that connection. Therefore, you need expect no opposition from me to that provision in the bill.

REFERRING THE CHARGE.

The next step is the forwarding by the brigade commander of the charge, with all accompanying papers, to the next higher authority having general court-martial jurisdiction, namely, the division commander, upon whose staff there is, under existing tables of organization, an officer of the Judge Advocate General's department with the rank of major or lieutenant colonel and hereinafter designated the division judge advocate. The division commander is under the mandatory requirement to refer the case to the division judge advocate who must be an officer of the Judge Advocate General's department; who, in the usual case, is a man with little or no military education or training.

Certainly nobody can object to that, and down to that point this is exactly the existing practice. I do not believe there has ever general court charge referred for trial, during the World War, a long time past, by any convening authority that was not ed by an examination and report of the judge advocate on ff, and I have no objection; if you put it in the law, it will ange matters at all. But he has this other duty—— ator LENROOT. Would that apply all the way down to the martial of an enlisted man?

. CROWDER. It would not apply to a special court, but to a l court.

ator LENROOT. Yes, I understand; but of a general court- l?

. CROWDER. I do not believe there is a case on record where a ment commander referred a case for trial until he had a report dge advocate upon the legal pleadings in the case.

ator LENROOT. Of course, if the convening authority was of rank than the commanding officer——

. CROWDER. I do not care how low he is; he may be a colonel, ow, commanding a territorial department, but he has got his advocate, and in all his actions he is governed by this same d procedure and practice.

ator LENROOT. I was thinking more of the qualification of an lual.

. CROWDER. The judge advocate is the same, irrespective of ik of the commander of the organization or territory or departator LENROOT. What would you say if the convening authority colonel of a regiment?

. CROWDER. Yes; a colonel may fall into command of a terri- department; but the department staff remains.

ator WARREN. Yes; of course.

. CROWDER. But the judge advocate has this other duty. vested under the pending bill with the exclusive power to

(a) not only whether an offense punishable by the Articles r is charged with legal sufficiency, but also (b) that there na facie proof that the accused colonel is guilty. It must ne in mind that the assumed case is a disciplinary one where idence is primarily strategical or tactical and wholly mili-

The exclusive power of determining the sufficiency of this gical, tactical and wholly military evidence is vested in an who, as I have said, in the usual case is without military ng or experience. Both the brigade commander and the on commander may see, in the facts of the case the failure t his regiment into action—a grave military offense affecting r the fighting efficiency of the division and threatening the ag efficiency of the Army, but the final decision of this question e sufficiency of evidence is vested by law in the division judge ate. Unless he will indorse on the charges, using the actual age of this proposed new law——“that it has been made to appear n that there is prima facie proof that the accused is guilty of the e charged” there is an end of the matter. In such a contingency me article 20 provides that the charge shall not “be referred to ed by a general court.”

m told that this parallel print of the bill is rather inaccurate.

ator WARREN. I think there was one copy of it here that had hanges made in it.

Gen. CROWDER. In other words, if this subordinate law officer, who is ordinarily without military training and experience, is not convinced that there exists a prima facie case, there is an end of the proceedings and the accused colonel escapes trial.

Senator LENROOT. Now, I want to get this clear in my mind. In the hypothetical case the charge is of a refusal to obey an order?

Gen. CROWDER. Refusal to put his regiment into action.

Senator LENROOT. Not through refusal of an order, but failure to perform a duty?

Gen. CROWDER. No, to obey an order which he receives in action at a particular time and refuses to obey. And it may be remembered that the same awkward situation may arise when the evidence is not strategical or tactical, but still military.

In the accused's statement, or in the statement of his witnesses which accompanies the charges, there may be found evidence showing that he did not attack because of the tired condition of his men; that his regiment had been imposed upon by being kept in the line longer than other regiments; or that he had an unusual number of sick; or that his rations were short or his supplies insufficient; or that to attack meant the annihilation of his regiment. This kind of evidence presents military questions to be decided; but under the new law it is not the division commander aided by his military staff, all with extensive training and experience, who will decide this question—it is a judge advocate with little or no military experience or training. I regard this veto power of the division judge advocate over the division commander as one of the grave defects of the pending bill.

Senator LENROOT. Right there, I do not know that I have it, but in the print I have before me it is not the investigation that the judge advocate would pass upon, but only the legal sufficiency of the charge.

Gen. CROWDER. Oh, no; he takes the evidence that accompanies the charges, and he must determine that there is a prima facie case against the accused.

Senator LENROOT. I see; that is right. He must determine that there is a prima facie case?

Gen. CROWDER. Yes.

Senator LENROOT. If we stop with the charge itself—with the legal sufficiency of the charge—the criticism would not apply?

Gen. CROWDER. No.

Senator LENROOT. I see. You are speaking of the bill before you—S. 64?

Gen. CROWDER. Yes. Now, I am going to assume that the judge advocate entertains correct views or that he defers to the views of military men on such questions and finds that a prima facie case exists, thus permitting the division commander to refer the charges for trial, in order that we may consider and discuss the next stage of the trial, which is the appointing of the court.

APPOINTING OF THE COURT.

It is provided in article 8 of the pending bill that the division commander may appoint a general court-martial, but it seems that he can do no such thing. His appointing authority is completely exhausted when he has performed the following three acts:

(a) When he designates, under article 10, a panel (strength not stated) "consisting of those who are by him deemed fair and impartial and competent to try the cases to be brought before them" (whether he is to constitute a large panel to be drawn from whenever courts-martial are to be convened in his command, or a special panel for each case, is not clear);

(b) When, under article 12, he appoints a court judge advocate—"an officer of the Judge Advocate General's Department, if such an officer is available, and whenever such officer is not available the appointing authority shall select that available officer of his command whom he deems best qualified therefor by reason of legal learning or aptitude, or judicial temperament;" and

(c) When, under article 21, he appoints a prosecutor—"an officer of the Judge Advocate General's Department, and if such an officer be not available the prosecutor shall, whenever practicable, be an officer or enlisted man deemed by the appointing authority specially qualified for the duty by reason of learning in or aptitude for the law; and one or more assistant prosecutors, when necessary, each of whom shall be competent to perform all the duties of the prosecutor."

The court judge advocate actually appoints the court; that is, he selects from the division commander's panel the eight members who are to constitute the court (art. 10 and art. 12a). Though, of course, not intended by those who drafted the pending bill, it is possible that the eight members of the court for the trial of this accused colonel may all be enlisted men (arts. 4, 5, and 17).

Of course, Senator Chamberlain did not intend that, and Gen. Ansell did not intend it. I take it that they did not intend it because there is in article 5 a provision in regard to the minimum number of enlisted men that must be upon a court in certain cases, but not stating any maximum; but it is a defect in the bill which I pass without laying stress upon it, because I know that if they were present they would say it was not intended.

Thus it appears that when the division commander appoints a court judge advocate, furnishes him with a panel, and appoints the prosecutor, he is through. All other affirmative acts necessary to be performed in appointing the court for the trial of the accused colonel must be performed by the court judge advocate. Let us assume that the court of eight members consisting of general officers and of colonels, superior in rank to the accused colonel, has been appointed and that we are at liberty to consider the next step, which is the organization of the court.

THE ORGANIZATION OF THE COURT.

The eight members selected by the court judge advocate from the panel, and the accused, with military counsel of his own selection and also with civilian counsel of the accused's selection employed by the court judge advocate and paid by the Government in case of acquittal (art. 22), meet on the date and at the place designated by the court judge advocate. We have first to consider the affidavits of prejudice which counsel for the accused may file. These are of three kinds:

First. Affidavits of prejudice, accompanied by certificates of good faith by the accused's counsel, against the division commander, alleging bias or prejudice on his part (art. 23):

Second. Affidavits of prejudice, accompanied by certificates of good faith by the accused's counsel, against the court alleging that by reason of any matter touching its constitution or composition it can not do justice (art. 23).

These two kinds of affidavits of prejudice are to be passed upon by the court judge advocate who sits in judgment on the division commander who appointed him to determine his bias or prejudice in making such appointment, also in designating the panel from which he selected the court, also in his decision to refer the charges, and also in his appointment of prosecutors, which are the only affirmative acts which devolve upon the division commander in respect of the trial. The court judge advocate also sits in judgment, in ruling upon the second class of affidavits of prejudice, on his own action in drawing the eight members of the court from that panel. If the court judge advocate holds that the division commander has shown bias or prejudice in any or all of his affirmative acts relating to the appointment of the court, or if he holds that the court that he himself has constituted may not proceed with "absolute impartiality," then the further organization of the court is stopped and the court judge advocate reports to the division commander. Article 23 continues: "Thereupon the next superior authority may appoint a court for the trial of the case," a clause of doubtful construction but which would probably be held to mean that the next superior authority—that is the corps commander—may designate a panel and appoint another court judge advocate, and the procedure above outlined would be reenacted with the hope, though not the certainty, of obtaining a different result.

Third. Affidavits of prejudice, accompanied by certificates of good faith, against the court judge advocate. No one passes upon this affidavit. With the filing of it the court judge advocate automatically ceases to function and the law requires a new court judge advocate to be appointed.

Of course this procedure of filing affidavits of prejudice against the court judge advocate may go on indefinitely, without further restriction than that the affidavits of prejudice must be certified by the counsel for the accused that they are made in good faith.

But let us assume that none of these three kinds of affidavits of prejudice have operated to block the trial; that the court judge advocate has not himself been challenged and has properly ruled on all other affidavits; that he has properly ruled on all challenges for cause which, under article 12 (b), he is given exclusive authority to pass upon; and that we have a duly organized court of eight general officers and colonels, superior in rank to the accused, with the prosecutor, court judge advocate, and counsel, all appointed or selected and ready to proceed further with the case; in order that we may discuss the next stage, namely, incidents of the trial.

INCIDENTS OF THE TRIAL.

The pending bill makes the court judge advocate in a very real sense the arbiter of the trial, as the following statement shows:

(a) He sits with the court (except when it is in closed session), though not a member of it. (Art. 12.)

(b) As we have seen, he passes upon all challenges, including affidavits of prejudice directed against the division commander and the court. (Art. 12 (b).)

(c) He advises the court and the division commander of any legal defects in the constitution and composition of the court, or in the charge before it for trial. (Art. 12.)

(d) He grants continuances upon the request of either prosecutor or accused's counsel. (Art. 25.)

(e) He rules upon the admissibility of evidence (art. 12b) applying the "rules of evidence which are generally recognized in the trial of criminal cases in the District Courts of the United States" (art. 41) and, because of this requirement of article 41, denying recognition of those exceptions to such rules as are recognized by such eminent authority as Greenleaf, viz: "Those which are of necessity created by the nature of the service and by the constitution of the court and its course of proceeding" (Greenleaf on Evidence, Vol. III, 16th ed., p. 49), denying also the applicability of the doctrine laid down by Winthrop, who says (vol. 1, p. 473):

"That in the absence, therefore, of statutory direction, they (courts-martial) can scarcely be held bound to the same direct adherence to common-law rules (of evidence) as are the true courts of the United States, and upon trial they may properly be allowed to pursue a more liberal course in regard to the admission of testimony and the examination of witnesses than do, habitually, the civil tribunals. (Grant v. Gould, 2 H. Black., 104; Kennedy, 120; Tullock, 13; Bombay, R. 19; Pratt, 198.) Their purpose is to do justice; and if the effect of a technical rule is found to be to exclude material facts or otherwise obstruct a full investigation, the rule may and should be departed from. Proper occasions, however, for such departures will be exceptional and unfrequent."

(f) He also rules upon pleas and motions. (Art. 12 (b).)

(g) At the conclusion of the case he sums up the evidence and discusses the law applicable to it, unless both he and the court consider it unnecessary. (Art. 12 (d).)

(h) "His rulings and advice given in the performance of his duty and made of record shall govern the court-martial." (Art. 12.)

It thus appears that in respect of every military incident the court judge advocate is, in a very real sense, the arbiter of the trial as fully as is the trial judge in the civil court; and he has even wider and more extensive power than the civil judge in the respects next to be noted, that is, with reference to the findings and sentence of the court.

FINDINGS AND SENTENCE.

The case has followed the routine of trial as outlined above. The court judge advocate has passed upon affidavits of prejudice against both the division commander and the court: upon challenges, peremptory and for cause; upon pleas to the jurisdiction and special pleas in bar, such as, of the statute of limitations, former trial, pardon or amnesty, constructive pardon, etc.; upon motions to quash or for continuances; has ruled on all questions of admissibility of this strategical, tactical, and wholly military evidence, and on all other questions arising in the procedure of the court on the trial; has "advised" the court with binding authority, and the convening authority, as to defects in the charges. He has also summed up the evidence in the case and discussed the law applicable to it; and the court has gone into closed session for the purpose of deliberating upon its findings. It may be that the question involved under the evidence as presented is not whether the colonel did obey his orders, but whether he ought to have obeyed them. The court-martial has reached its findings, which are announced in open court by the court judge advocate. Let us assume for the purpose of continuing the discussion that the finding is guilty as charged. What is the further procedure?

The court judge advocate has the following duties respecting the findings of the court:

1. He may approve the findings when, as a matter of law, the evidence of record requires such action. When as a matter of law the evidence of record requires such action he may withhold approval of the findings or disapprove the findings. If he adopts either course and then stops, what is the result? Is it an acquittal? This, I think, must be the result, for the law charges him with the duty of approving the finding, and it must, I think, be held that his action on the findings is necessary to their validity and that his power to approve includes the power to withhold the approval or to disapprove, and in either event to acquit. This conclusion seems to be justified when we consider his next duty in respect of the findings.

2. He may approve only so much of the finding of guilty of a particular offense as involves a finding of guilty of a lesser included offense, when, as a matter of law, the evidence of record requires such action. Of course, if he withholds full approval of the finding of guilty and approves only the finding of guilty of a lesser and included offense, this, under well-established doctrine, is a finding of not guilty of the major offense charged. It would seem, therefore, that we must hold, as noted under subhead 1, that the withholding of approval, or the disapproval of the finding of guilty, amounts to a finding of not guilty or acquittal. Viewed in this light the finding of guilty by the court of eight brigadier generals and superior-rank colonels has no validity in and of itself, when as a matter of law, in the opinion of the court judge advocate, the evidence of record requires withholding of approval, or disapproval, or a finding of guilty of a lesser included offense. It is also plain that the court judge advocate weighs the evidence under the doctrine of reasonable doubt and himself makes the determination of the degree of guilt or of innocence of the accused.

Now, as to the sentence and the exclusive power of the court judge advocate to impose it: With the imposition of sentence necessary to meet the needs of discipline in this assumed case of disobedience of orders to put a regiment into action, neither the court of eight brigadier generals or superior-rank colonels, nor the division commander, nor any other military man, up to the President of the United States, has anything to say. It is wholly the responsibility and duty of the major or lieutenant colonel, judge advocate, drawn, in the usual case, from civil life, of limited or no military training or experience, but a man "specially qualified by legal learning and experience" (art. 12). The accused colonel's sentence should depend, of course, largely upon the needs of discipline in the command but the measure of his punishment and its character lie in the discretion of a subordinate law officer.

To sum up the requirements of the pending bill as to findings and sentence, we have to note:

1. That the court judge advocate, in disagreement with the court as to the credibility of witnesses or weight of testimony, may, by withholding approval or by disapproval, convert a finding of guilty of disobedience of the order to fight into a finding of not guilty or an acquittal; or into a finding of not guilty of willful disobedience but guilty of the lesser and included offense of failure to obey, or simple neglect of duty with a minor degree of criminality; or attaching to the facts proved no criminality. And in respect of the action of the court judge advocate upon the findings, the law is careful to provide that "such action shall be held to be the action of the court." (Art. 12f.)

2. That the court judge advocate may, in disregard of the judgment of all military men, impose, not a dismissal with imprisonment, imple reprimand, or no punishment at all, in case he finds under evidence such justifying circumstances that he can not attach ality to the facts proved.

That the court judge advocate may suspend, in whole or in part, sentence short of death or dismissal.

One can follow the course of the trial as I have outlined it and appreciate the fundamental changes, which are as follows:

The division commander is deprived of his present authority to charges for trial; except as permitted by the division judge advocate.

The division commander is deprived of his authority to appoint members of a court-martial, his only duty being the furnishing of a panel from which the court judge advocate selects.

The court once selected and organized sit only as triers of fact the same as petit juries sit. All questions arising during the course of the trial (except possibly adjournment), including confessions, are decided by the court judge advocate.

The finality of the court's findings is taken away. In practical effect the court simply recommends findings which the court judge advocate may approve or disapprove; or modify to express a finding of a lesser included offense.

The court loses entirely its power to impose a sentence; the power of punishment to meet the disciplinary needs of the Army is determined by the subordinate law officer—the court judge advocate.

Convening authorities (ordinarily division commanders) and reviewing authorities (the President, and commanding generals of divisions) lose their authority to review for jurisdictional or invalidation, and that power is vested in a court of military appeals, composed of three civilian judges; and also their authority over the courts-martial except by way of mitigation of punishment after the fact. In other words, officers of the combatant army are stripped of virtually all their power of enforcing discipline through the agency of courts-martial.

Let us assume that the court judge advocate has, in agreement with the court, imposed a sentence of dismissal and imprisonment for a fixed term, as he is authorized to do under proposed article 62 of the pending bill; that the accused colonel is not content with the sentence and therefore does not waive in open court and of record a review of the case, as he may do under article 52 of the pending bill.

Under these assumptions the record of the trial is completed and forwarded to the division commander.

The division commander neither approves nor disapproves the sentence and sentence, nor does he comment upon the proceedings in any way. His sole duty, upon the receipt of the record, is to forward the record without delay to the Judge Advocate General of the Army.

(Art. 38.) The sole function of the Judge Advocate General of the Army is to "immediately transmit to the court of military appeals the record of all proceedings which carry sentences involving dismissal, or dishonorable discharge, or confinement for a term of more than six months." (Art. 51.) And it may be read, incidentally, that the whole duty of the Judge Advocate General with respect to all other general court-martial cases is to receive and file the record of them. (Art. 51.)

COURT OF MILITARY APPEALS.

The court of military appeals consists of three civilian judges sitting in Washington. They are entirely outside of and unconnected with the Army. They are citizens "learned in the law," appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, holding office during good behavior, with pay and emoluments, including the privilege of retirement upon full pay, of a circuit judge of the United States. (Art. 52.) They are as supreme in the colonel's case, upon appeal, as the court judge advocate was upon its trial. With respect of the findings and sentence, they exercise the following powers:

(a) They can disapprove a finding of guilty because of errors of law evidenced by the record and injuriously affecting the substantial rights of the accused, without regard to whether such errors were made the subject of objections or exceptions at the trial;

(b) For the same reasons they can approve only so much of a finding of guilty of a particular offense as involves a finding of guilty of a lesser included offense;

(c) They may, for the same reasons disapprove the whole or any part of the sentence; and

(d) In case of findings and sentence being disapproved, as above provided, they may advise the division commander (or other convening authority) that he may lawfully order a new trial by another court.

(e) They may recommend clemency.

In the colonel's case we will assume that the principal questions presented to these civilian judges are "whether the evidence justified the conviction of willfull disobedience," or whether only "failure to obey orders" should be substituted as a finding. And, having this power to modify findings when, to use the language of Gen. Ansell, "the evidence is not reasonably sufficient to sustain the finding of guilty of the major offense," it must be held, I think, that they may weigh the evidence and apply the doctrine of "reasonable doubt" to the solution of all questions of fact. I would not necessarily reach this conclusion were I discussing the authority of any civil appellate court of this country to determine "errors of law" injuriously affecting the substantial rights of the accused. For no civil appellate court in this country has the extraordinary power to disapprove a finding of guilty or to substitute a finding of a lesser included offense.

I think that the phrase "errors of law," the existence of which call into exercise these extraordinary powers to disapprove and modify findings, must be construed in the light of these extraordinary powers; that it must be held to be an "error of law" when there has been error in weighing the evidence or in the application of the doctrine of the reasonable sufficiency of the evidence to sustain a charge; otherwise the authority to substitute a lesser and included offense in the finding would find such limited application as to make this authority of little value to the service.

Now, I have tried to state the application of the pending bill to the trial of a purely military offense and I think it sufficiently appears that its effect is largely to take away from military men the discipline of the Army and transfer it to civilians. That offends my sense of what is right much more than it would if the proposition were to turn over to civilian control common-law and statutory felonies committed by persons within the Military Establishment.

In considering common law or statutory offenses, like manslaughter, robbery, embezzlement, and larceny, we get a different picture. The advisability of leaving questions of law, including the determination of weight of evidence and of the measure of punishment, to a subordinate law officer—the court judge advocate—rather than to a court composed of military officers is more apparent. These offenses are committed either against other members of the armed forces or against civilians. In both cases, as I understand it, the practice in England, in time of peace, is to turn over all such cases to the civil courts for trial. The practice in our country, in time of peace, is generally to turn over only the second class of cases to our civil courts for trial, and our code expressly provides for this. I mean where the person offended against is a civilian. It is more convenient in England than in our country, because of the scattered condition of our Army and the sparseness of our population relative to theirs. When the common law or statutory offense is committed by a soldier against another soldier it affects discipline of the command in a very direct way and, I think, the discipline of our Army would suffer to a very great degree if we adopted the policy of turning over all such cases to the civil courts for trial. As these cases do affect the discipline of the Army we should have to consider, as in a strictly military case, the disadvantages which would result from turning over to a subordinate law officer, usually without military training or experience, and to a court of military appeals consisting of civilian judges, the question of the measure of punishment. It is a subject to which I have given much thought without being able to devise any way of treating these two classes of cases separately; and, of course, they can not be separated in time of war.

I fear that it is an absolute necessity that the military jurisprudence should carry the burden of adjudicating and determining all of these offenses of a common law and statutory character.

I have not touched upon the anomaly that would result if, under this pending bill, the President were the convening authority. Assume that he has convened a court-martial for the trial of some high ranking officer in the Army. His duties would be limited to furnishing a panel and appointing a court judge advocate and a prosecutor, and so forth. The trial would proceed along the lines indicated, and when the case came in, a court of military appeals would determine for the President all the questions presented by the record. These questions might arise out of the participation of a division or a field army in a battle.

The idea of a civil court of military appeals is wholly untenable from my point of view. And so, too, is the idea of an exclusively military court of appeals functioning independently of the President in a case of the kind I have mentioned. I think it would affect in the most detrimental way the fighting efficiency of our forces. That seems to be the view taken by the Kernan-O’Ryan-Ogden Board. That board injects the question of the constitutionality of such legislation, which I have not mentioned because I am not prone to raise constitutional objections. I would prefer to see this question of appellate power settled on the ground of what is best for the service and the fighting efficiency of our armies. I have in this review invited the attention of the committee to all articles in the pending bill which have to do with trials. By consideration of them you get a picture of the military jurisprudence that would be set up if the pending bill were enacted into law.

Senator LENROOT. If you have finished your review of the law, I will ask you some questions.

Gen. CROWDER. I have finished with that part of my statement.

Senator LENROOT. I want to ask you some questions, not at all in opposition to your construction of the bill, because I am inclined to agree with the construction you have given; but I do want to ask you some questions along this line; I am not going into the question of how the court of appeals, if one should be created, should be constituted now. If the jurisdiction of this court was limited to passing upon prejudicial errors and jurisdiction, but was in no sense permitted to substitute their judgment for that of the court upon the facts, to what extent would your objection still apply—not, now, going to the constitution of the court?

Gen. CROWDER. My objections would still exist, and for this reason: There is no jurisprudence that needs, so much as the military, an appellate review on both the law and the facts. I should hate to see an appellate review limited to jurisdictional and prejudicial errors alone, or what is sought to be designated in the bill as "errors of law." The original trial before a court-martial is necessarily summary, erroneous findings of fact are more probable and excusable than in plenary trials before petit juries in the calmness of county seats. I hope, sincerely hope, that it will not be the final judgment to create an appellate jurisdiction for the review of errors of law alone. I can not emphasize too greatly this view. Now in this other field of common law and statutory felony it may well be that a civil court of appeals would function more efficiently. Civilians would be better qualified to try such cases, not more than 14 per cent of the total, just as military men are better qualified to try the remaining 86 per cent of military cases.

Senator LENROOT. Yes.

Gen. CROWDER. I do not think, however, that a divided appellate power would be either practicable or wise. I do not think that anybody would be justified in asking for that separation of the powers unless he could prove that the machinery set up under General Order No. 7 had made errors. We have to-day a unified appellate jurisdiction under General Order No. 7, and nobody has appeared before you and asserted since that order went into effect there has been any injustice done except in the failure to handle questions of clemency. If the experiment has been successful in having the appellate jurisdiction consolidated that way, I can not help but say, "Why change?" In other words, I will always be able to command in my office qualifications of the highest character to constitute the board of review; always be able to deal with records that set forth every bit of evidence that is taken by the trial court; always be able to present to the Secretary of War, and through him to the President, whom we propose to vest with full appellate power, all the error there is, jurisdictional or prejudicial of law or fact. And if the system has worked during this war, I ask "Why change?" Let it be a question of fact. Has the machinery worked under General Order No. 7?

And if it has, if it does not appear that there is any complaint to make against the system, and it seems to have won the commendation of the American Bar Association after examining a large number of cases, then I say, "Why change?"

Senator LENROOT. As a matter of fact, General, under the prevailing system, while your office in practical effect is exercising this supervisory power, you have no jurisdiction to do so?

Gen. CROWDER. No, but we propose to create it in the present legislation.

Senator LENROOT. You propose to create it still in only an advisory capacity?

Gen. CROWDER. But to give the President the full power.

Senator LENROOT. Well——

Gen. CROWDER. Then again I come to this point. If there was any failure upon the part of the reviewing authorities and the President to respect the advice that we have given, it might be necessary to consider an appellate jurisdiction independent of the President and the reviewing authority; but has your attention been called to any? Four cases to the reviewing authorities below. Six cases where the Secretary of War, a civilian lawyer, has assumed to determine in the office above.

Senator LENROOT. You are proposing to grant to the President a reviewing authority not only upon the facts, not only general powers, but upon questions of law which you never expect him to exercise independently, and presumably he might not be qualified to exercise independently.

Gen. CROWDER. Neither is the President qualified to exercise command independently. He acts on advice of experts in matters of command. And I assume that the Judge Advocate General and the Secretary of War, his legal experts, will advise him in the exercise of this appellate authority.

Senator LENROOT. Yes.

Gen. CROWDER. And that he will follow their advice.

Senator LENROOT. That is the whole point. You are creating an appellate tribunal in name that you do not expect will independently exercise the powers that are given him.

Gen. CROWDER. No; I expect the President to exercise it upon a legal review prepared in the office of the Judge Advocate General. I have no objection to the way you state it, and I believe it will be 100 per cent effective.

Senator LENROOT. It may be, but I am stating the terms of the law itself.

Gen. CROWDER. Yes.

Senator LENROOT. In so far as prejudicial errors are concerned, I take it from your statement that you see in itself no objection to a properly constituted court. I am not speaking now of how the court should be constituted, but of a properly constituted court, of that power being vested that would not interfere with discipline.

Gen. CROWDER. Yes, although I am frank to say that I think it would interfere with discipline if such a court is superior to the President and able to overrule or conclude the President.

Senator LENROOT. Now, going one step further, as to the constitution of that court, supposing a court of appeals were created, a majority of whom should be military men, but a permanent court. What would you say?

Gen. CROWDER. First, and of minor importance, let me say that you would have to choose between such a court and the continuance of the office of the Judge Advocate General. Of course, with a court vested with that power, the Judge Advocate General of the Army would have little or nothing to do with military justice. Of course, there would remain his duty to render opinions connected with the civil administration of the War Department.

Senator LENROOT. He would have a great deal to do with military justice. He would have a large force under him.

Gen. CROWDER. The military justice would depend upon the court of appeals and not upon him at all.

Senator LENROOT. Would it not be very proper to have the judge advocate present them to the court?

Gen. CROWDER. Present the case?

Senator LENROOT. To represent the Government, so to speak.

Gen. CROWDER. Before that court?

Senator LENROOT. Before that court.

Gen. CROWDER. Well, that would mitigate the evil somewhat. But if you will permit me one other suggestion, I think you and I will have a complete meeting of minds. I can conceive of this appellate jurisdiction as you have outlined it, but it gives me some pause when I reflect upon the fact that what you propose is a completely new experiment which no great nation has heretofore ever attempted—and probably no great nation ever will attempt—except Russia. They have tried out your proposition in France. Their court of revision is composed wholly of army officers in time of war and in the theater of war, and of a majority of army officers under other conditions, but the President is authorized to suspend its functions in time of war, or in time of peace in a besieged area he can suspend this appellate jurisdiction. They have also given their President the right to create emergency war courts from which there is no appeal. Now, if the most advanced nation that has dealt with this appellate review has placed such qualifications upon a military appellate body like that, would it not be invading the field of untried experiment if we, by rigid statute law, operative at all times and under all conditions, either peace or war, should create an appellate court with absolute power to conclude the President and all commanding generals under him?

Senator LENROOT. That would go to the extent of whether our review would be given such a construction as in this bill, or a very limited power such as I have suggested. I am asking these questions to get your ideas upon it.

Gen. CROWDER. I am trying to speak moderately upon this whole experiment. I hope that it will not be the final judgment of Congress to set up a tribunal limited to a review of errors of law only. I hope that we will always have an appellate review on both law and fact. It would be a great mistake, it seems to me, to limit the appellate review, as it is limited in the pending bill, to questions of law; and I must admit that I can not define what is a question of law under the terms of this bill. It is something less broad, of course, than questions of law and fact. Something is excluded. Now, here we are with a jurisprudence that is older than the civil jurisprudence. with records of trials that contain every word that is uttered from the time the accused enters the court room until he leaves it—I hope that it will not be the judgment of this committee to set up a limited review. We have got the whole review. The convening authority below can weigh both questions of law and fact when he comes to act, and so, too, should the President have this power.

Senator LENROOT. The reviewing authority, I quite agree with you, has full power to measure questions of fact; but again, the convening authority must rely upon a judge advocate when it comes to questions of law, and not exercise his own judgment.

Gen. CROWDER. Yes, he should.

Senator LENROOT. That is the difficulty for me.

Gen. CROWDER. But it has not proved a practical difficulty. In judging of the personnel of your proposed court of appeals, it is important to bear in mind that about 90 per cent of the cases coming before that court are military cases. It is unreasonable to assume that any but military men could judge of the weight or relevancy of the evidence in determining the conduct of a man upon the field of battle, where the evidence is strategical or tactical and wholly military. The issues are those which only a military man who has been trained in those matters can understand. How could a civilian understand and judge of the conditions of battle in the Argonne so as to fix responsibility for failure of a division or Army commander, or even a colonel of a line regiment?

Senator LENROOT. I am not speaking of a civilian tribunal. I put my final proposition, of a tribunal the majority of whom should be military men.

Gen. CROWDER. Even in that case the objection that I have previously advanced remains, that when we shut the President off from a final say in such matters, we impair his responsibility, as the constitutional commander in chief, for winning the war; and I feel very certain, if you pass a bill of this kind, that ultimately its constitutionality will go before the Supreme Court.

Senator LENROOT. On this question raised by the Kernan report?

Gen. CROWDER. I am very much afraid, if you undertake to shut the President off from his relations to the discipline of the Army, and shut off commanding generals under him from their relations to the discipline of the Army, by creating a court of appeal with power to conclude them all, that the constitutional question raised by the Kernan-O'Ryan-Ogden Board will ultimately come before the Supreme Court for settlement, and in a case which will be very embarrassing, because the case will be identified with some great national crisis. I have just that to say about the constitutional question.

Senator LENROOT. I have not heretofore expressed any opinion, but I must say that if the view of the Kernan report is correct, I think the sooner it is found out the better. If there is any such autocratic power vested in the President of the United States as commander-in-chief of the Army, beyond the control of Congress, we ought to know it. That is my view of it.

Gen. CROWDER. Well, I have not based my opposition on constitutional grounds.

Senator LENROOT. I know that you have not, at all.

Gen. CROWDER. I preferred to rest the whole question upon what is best for the Army.

Senator LENROOT. Yes, I understand.

Gen. CROWDER. And I am willing to assume the constitutionality of legislation of that character.

Senator LENROOT. Yes.

Gen. CROWDER. And my only purpose there was to say that I have no doubt in time of some great crisis, the constitutional question will arise.

Take the question of the President convening the court. I did not emphasize that in my application of the law. Suppose that he, instead of a subordinate commander, is the convening authority, and then consider the President submitting to a court judge advocate below, and to a military court of appeals here, the question of whether some field commander or some division commander or corps commander in the battle of the Argonne has failed to do his part.

Senator LENROOT. Well, that all goes to two questions. One involves, of course, the question of whether the Constitution applies at all, which you discussed somewhat, and, secondly, whether the President is governed not only by law but by common principles of justice—whether there are any limitations upon him. If there be such, I see no more reason why, upon questions of law, he should not be governed by a military tribunal as Commander in Chief; he certainly is, just as a civil officer is, by the very men that he appoints to the bench, and they control his action and find his action invalid in a given case.

Gen. CROWDER. Of course, everybody sees that point instantly upon its being mentioned; but what would be the effect in the end, I am asking, what would be the effect upon efficiency if the man he appointed would have the right to control and nullify his action as Commander in Chief?

Senator LENROOT. If he did not obey the law, if he violated the law, I do not know why he should not be subject, as Commander in Chief, to nullification of any action in violation of law.

Gen. CROWDER. I am afraid this question of military relations is sui generis and that it does not aid you much to invoke the analogies of our civil jurisprudence.

Senator LENROOT. Well, take this case: Under existing law, take the case of the President convening a court, as you suggest. Supposing that the President should undertake to convene a court in violation of the Articles of War. Do you not think habeas corpus would lie to a civil court?

Gen. CROWDER. Unquestionably; and when the privilege of this writ is not suspended it would be effective.

Senator LENROOT. Do you not think that the civil courts therefore, to that extent, would have the control of the action of the President, even though he is Commander in Chief?

Gen. CROWDER. Oh, of course.

Senator LENROOT. So that to that extent now the courts may control the action of the President as Commander in Chief.

Gen. CROWDER. Yes; controlled by habeas corpus, but as to jurisdiction only.

Before I conclude my testimony I wish to call the attention of this subcommittee to a matter and see what my responsibility is. If I stop here I shall leave many matters uncovered which this committee has admitted as in some way relevant, and most of them the accusa-of a single witness, Gen. Ansell. Illustrative of the intemperate general character of these accusations, I cite the following as examples:

Against generals of the Army:

"The weakest grade in the Army of the United States" (p. 121), which is the name which are drawn convening and reviewing authorities of courts-martial; "many of them, jokes to everybody else in the world except ourselves and ourselves" (p. 121);

"Lacking in experience" (p. 121), citing Gens. Pershing and Wood as examples, saying:

"That heterogeneous collection of troops on the Mexican border" "which Gen. Ansell commanded"; "no professional soldier would ever call that a division" (p. 121); "the command in the Philippines was not the kind of command that requires general leadership" (p. 122); and again,

"have had a hundred times their court-martial experience" (p. 121).

Against the Inspector General:

"Thoroughly reactionary" (p. 116); "the most reactionary of men"; "prejudiced and reactionary" (p. 173); "whose views savor of professional absolutism" (p. 173).

"With trying to browbeat and intimidate Gen. Ansell in connection with the investigation of Gen. Ansell's part in the present controversy; in trying to compel Gen. Ansell to make a statement against his will by threatening that "this thing is serious, and my report will go to Congress, and, Ansell, when it gets to Congress, will be very detrimental to you" (p. 209).

"With habitually using the power of his office in connection with investigations to compel accused persons and others to make statements against their will and to intimidate themselves by menaces, threats, and intimidation (p. 209).

"With allowing officers in his department in camp and division to compel testimony from suspected or accused soldiers, and then use it against them (p. 209).

"With having taken part with the Secretary of War and the Acting Judge Advocate General (Gen. Kreger) in frequent conferences with the court-martial committee of the American Bar Association under such circumstances that "I, for one, as long as I live, will not express any respect for any such committee, no matter how high it is or whatever association it may be a part of" (p. 214).

Against Gen. Biddle, former Assistant Chief of Staff:

"Thoroughly reactionary" (p. 116);

"Sharing with the Inspector General in views that "savor of professional absolutism" (p. 123).

Against Maj. Gen. Kernan, Maj. Gen. O'Ryan, and Lieut. Col. Ogden—the members of the Kernan-O'Ryan-Ogden Board—and Col. Barrows, the recorder of that board:

"The most reactionary set of men in the United States" (p. 215).

"So prejudiced, and known to be so prejudiced, that many officers of high standing liberal views refused to express their views on military justice to that committee" (p. 215).

Against former President Taft—not admitted to the record, illustrating the intemperate and irresponsible character of these accusations:

"Perverting "his power to the furtherance of a plan * * * to maintain the existing vicious system of military justice, and to do me great personal injury" (statement of Gen. Ansell, New York World, Sept. 16, 1919);

"Abusing "the confidence and trust of the American people" and "misleading the people" (ibid.); and "Debasing "his exalted position as ex-President of the Republic to become an ignorant and bitter partisan in behalf of his friend," Gen. Crowder (ibid.).

There is also a formidable list of accusations against the court-martial committee of the American Bar Association, but particularly against the Secretary of War and myself. The list is a long one. Many of these accusations carry their own refutation.

Then there follows a long list of accusations against the Chief of Staff and against the chiefs of bureaus, and others.

Now, the question is how much responsibility do I incur by leaving unanswered charges that have been admitted by this committee to their record as in some way relevant?

It will protract the sessions of this committee a week if I answer fully all those charges.

Senator WARREN. Are you putting that as a question?

Gen. CROWDER. I am asking the question. I do not like to leave those things unanswered if the inference by Members of Congress is going to be that such a course admits the truth of any of them.

Senator WARREN. You enter a general denial?

Gen. CROWDER. Sometimes a little truth is interwoven with a lot of misleading, inaccurate statements, and made to serve all the purposes thereby of positive misstatement. The explanation to be made is rendered very difficult.

Senator LENROOT. I would suggest that Gen. Crowder place in the record anything he desires upon that general subject. Of course that is not the issue anyway before this committee. The only thing I assume is that the committee is charged with such recommendations to the full committee, as to legislation upon this subject, if there are any changes to be made. I think that in view of what has been said if you desire, the committee should hear you and give you the fullest opportunity; but certainly you should be given full liberty to place in the record anything you desire to.

Gen. CROWDER. Then I can put in these matters in the form of appendices. I will scan again the principal of those charges. Where I think they do not carry their own refutation, I will answer them. That was where I wanted your instructions. I could talk here for a week in regard to issues of fact that have been raised, and probably talk of what is relevant to those issues, but not at all relevant to the real issues before this committee.

Senator WARREN. I agree entirely with the Senator from Wisconsin, that there was no occasion for a great deal of that to go into the record; we have nothing to do with very much of that kind of evidence. All we have to do is just what the Senator says, to consider what is necessary—what changes are necessary, if any, in the present laws—and whether this bill or some other should be reported from this committee to the full committee and from them to the Senate. So that all of this other matter should have, in our consideration, nothing to do with the question before us of the necessity of reforming the law. But, on the other hand, I think you should have freedom to insert in the record anything respecting the issues that you consider relevant, because I know that you will not transgress.

Gen. CROWDER. I will avail myself of that permission and will insert such memoranda, as appendices, with a list or table of contents so as to direct the attention of the committee to any particular subject where there may be any question in their minds as to what the facts may be.

Senator WARREN. You will be able to conclude your testimony to-day, will you?

Gen. CROWDER. I have finished all that I care to talk about to-day. I will insert as an appendix the five or six different suggestions that have been made to you of courts of appeal. There are several bills pending. I will do that in order that you may have in the briefest possible compass these alternative schemes, if that will be helpful; and I may add a few explanatory notes. There are two or three bills in the House and two or three in the Senate.

Senator WARREN. I think that is a point about which we can not have too much information.

Gen. CROWDER. If I can be of any further assistance to the committee on these points, or if there is anything I have not covered, I shall be very glad to do so now. This matter is one about which I am deeply interested.

The propositions before the committee, except those submitted by myself, Senator McKellar, and by the Kernan-O'Ryan-Ogden Board, carry appellate power further than it has ever been carried in the history of armies by any leading nation, and if you adopt them, you are a pioneer in that field.

Senator WARREN. Inasmuch as we have parallels before us from individuals, one from the Kernan Board, and a not quite complete parallel from the American Bar Association, would it be too much to ask the general to take his suggested amendments and put them in the form of a bill and submit them in parallel columns in the same shape as this print which we already have?

Senator LENROOT. I would be glad to have it.

Gen. CROWDER. May we have that made of record, that you desire me to put in the record my suggestions of amendments, just as a formal bill?

Senator WARREN. Yes. It could be gotten up in the form of an ordinary bill, or you could print it in parallel columns for comparison with the present Articles of War.

Senator LENROOT. If it could be done in that way, in parallel columns, it would be very much easier for us to use.

I wish, also, Mr. Chairman, that we might have a print of the Kernan report.

Senator WARREN. They printed it in the department, you know.

Senator LENROOT. We could have that Kernan report taken and put in this form of parallel columns with the present Articles of War.

Senator WARREN. Very well.

Gen. CROWDER. I brought to your attention the first day that I was testifying a quotation of Gen. Ansell, purporting to be from the language of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Grafton case, which language we have been unable to find in that case, and you called for the citation, Senator Lenroot. I ought, in justice to Gen. Ansell, to spread upon the record an explanation if anybody has been able to find that language which he attributes to the Supreme Court in the Grafton case.

Senator LENROOT. I do not want it. I was interested in giving the reference to the volume and page of the Supreme Court reports.

Gen. CROWDER. I do not like to leave the inference on the record that any man would attribute language to the Supreme Court which the Supreme Court had not used, if anybody is able to find that language; for, I am frank to say, if the Supreme Court ever used that language, I am out of court on that issue.

In concluding my statement before this subcommittee, I wish to make some additional comment upon the pending bill. In its fundamentals that bill is built upon a distrust of or lack of confidence in nearly every existing military authority, including the President of the United States, the Secretary of War, and also commanding generals under them who are classified in testimony before this committee as "jokes;" it implies distrust of the many thousands of officers of the great Army we raised to fight this World's War, who participated in the administration of military justice by general, special, and summary courts. In this bill you are asked to brush aside the traditions of the American Army and build anew a jurisprudence bearing faithful analogies to the civil jurisprudence, notwithstanding the fact that, even in the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, it is recognized that the Army and Navy of the United States are emergency forces and require other and swifter methods of administering justice than prevail in civil jurisprudence, where normal conditions usually obtain and where, if normal conditions are disturbed, resort is had to the more expeditious military method.

The arguments by which this proposed new system has been supported are those of sensationalism—sensational appeals to American homes based upon alleged individual miscarriages of justice, and attributing to the officers who fought this war, and who were drawn from the same American homes as were the soldiers in the ranks, a tyranny which I, for one, do not believe characterized their attitude toward the men in the ranks.

Because I do not believe that Mr. Taft, of prolonged judicial experience, who lived his official life in the Philippines in such close contact with the Army and Navy, and who, as Secretary of War and President of the United States, had such direct relations to the administration of military justice in the graver cases, is a man to "debase his exalted position as an ex-President of the Republic to become an ignorant and bitter partisan" on this issue; because I do not believe that most of our general officers, who have acted as convening and reviewing authorities during the period of this world's war, are "jokes;" because I do believe that the sense of justice of the American people is fairly reflected in the lives and judgments of the officers of this great world army who have been drawn from American homes, and that they are not men thirsting for the lives and liberties and blood of the men in the ranks, I think that the pending bill, whose fundamentals are built upon this general view, should be rejected as a basis of legislation, and that we should proceed by way of amendment of the existing code to enact all of the reforms which our war experience has shown to be necessary.

I believe in safeguarding the administration of justice and I believe it can be done in a way consistent with winning battles and wars, which, I presume, it will be conceded is the primary purpose of maintaining armies. To this end I would strengthen the safeguards in the actual trials of men below; and above, would secure an adequate legal review of cases, on both the law and fact, and not on errors of law alone as is provided in the pending bill; but never in establishing such a review would I favor divesting the President of his present relations to the discipline of the Army, as is proposed in the pending bill, any more than I would favor divesting him of the command of the Army. Normally his control in both cases is exercised through subordinate officers; but under our system the authority is reserved to him in the graver crises of our National life to make his own control effective.

(At 1 o'clock p. m., the subcommittee adjourned subject to the call of the chairman.)

APPENDICES.

I. SENATOR CHAMBERLAIN'S CHARGES AGAINST GEN. CROWDER.

- (a) That the selective-service law, as originally drawn by Gen. Crowder and transmitted to Congress by the War Department, was of "Prussian character."
- (b) That the War Department project of the selective-service law "evidences the hand of the military autocrat." That Gen. Crowder is at heart a military autocrat.
- (c) That Col. Warren, and not Gen. Crowder, was responsible for the civilian composition of the selective-service boards.
- (d) The Army and Navy Club incident: Gen. Crowder's refusal to acknowledge an introduction to Senator Chamberlain.

II. GEN. ANSELL'S CHARGES AGAINST GEN. CROWDER.

- (a) Gen. Ansell's charge that he was relieved from all duties and responsibilities in connection with the administration of military justice after November, 1917.
- (b) Gen. Ansell's charge that he was again relieved from all connection with the administration of military justice after the armistice.
- (c) Gen. Ansell's charge against the administration of the Judge Advocate General's office.
- (d) The alleged "propaganda bureau."
- (e) Gen. Ansell's charge that Gen. Crowder failed to forward to the Secretary of War Gen. Ansell's report of his European trip.
- (f) Gen. Ansell's charge that Gen. Crowder opposed granting counsel to accused, and giving accused legal protection at the trial.
- (g) Gen. Ansell's charge that Gen. Crowder entertains and has expressed illiberal views as to appellate procedure.
- (h) Gen. Ansell's charge that Gen. Crowder entertains and has expressed illiberal views as to accused's rights of challenge.

III. ATTACKS UPON THE PRESENT SYSTEM OF ADMINISTERING MILITARY JUSTICE AND UPON THE ARTICLES OF WAR AND THE REVISION OF 1916.

- (a) Alleged archaism of the Articles of War.
- (b) Same subject: Alleged "archaism" of the present Articles of War.
- (c) Court of military appeals: Gen. Ansell's statement that Gen. Sherman and Gen. James B. Fry, former provost marshal general, advocated such a court.
- (d) Condemnation of the ninety-sixth article of war, the so-called "general article."
- (e) Charge that General Order No. 7, War Department, January 17, 1918, prevented or hindered recommendations of clemency by the Judge Advocate General.

IV. GEN. ANSELL'S INACCURATE STATEMENTS.

- (a) Concerning review of records of trial in the Judge Advocate General's office.
- (b) That forfeiture of citizenship is entailed upon conviction by court-martial.
- (c) Concerning the Camp Grant rape cases.
- (d) Concerning the proportion of charges preferred, referred for trial, convictions, acquittals.
- (e) Concerning statistics of court-martial trials for the year preceding the armistice.
- (f) Concerning the special clemency board organized in the office of the Judge Advocate General.
- (g) Concerning the same subject: Clemency board.
- (h) Concerning the same subject: Organization of the clemency board.
- (i) Concerning the effects of conviction by court-martial.
- (j) Concerning the investigation of Gen. Ansell's accusations by the Inspector General

V. APPELLATE POWER: VARIOUS IDEAS SUBMITTED TO CONGRESS.

- (a) Opinion of Attorney General Wirt, September 14, 1818.
- (b) S. 3692 and H. R. 9164 (bill drafted by Gen. Crowder and submitted by Secretary of War, January, 1918).
- (c) Proposed joint resolution prepared for Senator McKellar, February 20, 1919
- (d) Gen. Crowder's recommendation in his letter of March 10, 1919, to the Secretary of War.
- (e) Kernan board report, July 17, 1919.
- (f) S. 5320 (Chamberlain, January, 1919), H. R. 14883 (Siegel, Jan. 22, 1919), H. R. 15945 (Johnson, February, 1919), and H. R. 431 (Siegel, May 19, 1919).
- (g) Senate joint resolution 18 (McKellar, May 20, 1919).
- (h) S. 64 (Chamberlain, May 20, 1919) and H. R. 367 (Johnson, May 19, 1919).
- (i) H. R. 9156 (Dallinger, Sept. 9, 1919).

VI. TABULAR STATEMENT OF THE ORGANIZATION OF BRITISH AND FRENCH MILITARY TRIBUNALS.

- (a) Organization of British military tribunals, including the functioning of the British judge advocate general's office.
- (b) Organization of French military tribunals, including French courts of revision.

VII. GEN. ANSELL'S ACCUSATIONS AGAINST OTHERS BESIDES GEN. CROWDER.

- (a) Against the generals of the Army.
- (b) Against the Inspector General.
- (c) Against Gen. Biddle, formerly Assistant Chief of Staff.
- (d) Against Maj. Gen. Kernan, Maj. Gen. O'Ryan, and Lieut. Col. Ogden, the members of the Kernan-O'Ryan-Ogden board, and against Lieut. Col. Barrows, the recorder of that board.
- (e) Against Brig. Gen. E. A. Kreger, Acting Judge Advocate General of the Army.
- (f) Against former President Taft.
- (g) Against the Chief of Staff.
- (h) Against the court-martial committee of the American Bar Association.
- (i) Against the Secretary of War.
- (k) Against Prof. John H. Wigmore, dean of the law school of Northwestern University, former colonel in the Judge Advocate General's Department.

VIII. SUMMARY OF INSPECTOR GENERAL'S FINDINGS.

- (a) Specific findings and detailed report to Secretary of War.

IX. GEN. CROWDER'S ATTITUDE TOWARD RETURN OF ACQUITTAL FOR RECONSIDERATION.

- (a) Charge of Gen. Ansell respecting the return to court of acquittals.
- (b) Same subject: Gen. Crowder's attitude.
- (c) Same subject: Recognition and approval of the power.

X. COURTS-MARTIAL IN GEN. ANSELL'S COMMAND WHILE HE WAS A COMPANY COMMANDER.

- (a) Summary courts-martial.
- (b) General courts-martial.

I. SENATOR CHAMBERLAIN'S CHARGES AGAINST GEN. CROWDER.

(A.) CHARGE—PRUSSIAN CHARACTER OF THE SELECTIVE-SERVICE LAW AS DRAWN BY ME AND TRANSMITTED TO CONGRESS BY THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

Senator Chamberlain injected this wholly irrelevant issue into the discussion of the subject of "Military justice" in his speech of August 18, 1919, withheld by him for revision and published in its revised form in the Congressional Record of August 20, 1919 (p. 4338, et seq.). He recurs to this subject in his speech of October 6-7, 1919, withheld by him for revision and published in its revised form in the Congressional Record of October 11, 1919 (p. 7150, et seq.). He pretends in this latter speech to be speaking from record proof and quotes from the selective-service law, as introduced in the House of Representatives on the 19th of April, 1917, the following paragraph:

That the President is authorized and empowered to constitute and establish throughout the United States tribunals for the purpose of enforcing and carrying into effect the terms and provisions of this act, together with such regulations as he shall prescribe and determine necessary for its administration. A majority of the members of each tribunal shall be citizens of the United States not connected with the Military Establishment: Provided further, That upon the complaint of any person who feels himself aggrieved by his enrollment or draft as is herein provided, any court of record, State or Federal, having general jurisdiction in matters pertaining to the writ of habeas corpus, according to local laws or by act of Congress, shall have jurisdiction, by proceedings in the nature of the writ of habeas corpus, to hear summarily and determine the rights of such person.

He leaves one to infer that the chairman of the House Military Committee (Mr. Dent) introduced the bill in the form in which the War Department had submitted it and then proceeds to criticize it by saying that it left to the Judge Advocate General the power to appoint the men who were to pass upon the qualifications of registrants, and adds the observation that if there were to be any appeal at all it was to be to the courts rather than to tribunals in the locality from which the registrants came.

Answer.—It is a sufficient answer to this attack of Senator Chamberlain to point to the fact that the provision against which he hurls his criticism is not to be found in the War Department project of the selective-service law, but is a provision formulated by the House Military Committee. I had no more to do with the preparation of this provision than did Senator Chamberlain himself. His quarrel—if he has one, which I do not concede—is, therefore, with the House Military Affairs Committee and not with me. I have verified the fact in conference with the Hon. S. Hubert Dent, jr., the then chairman of the House Military Committee.

(B.) CHARGE—WAR DEPARTMENT PROJECT OF THE SELECTIVE-SERVICE LAW: IT EVIDENCES THE HAND OF THE MILITARY AUTOCRAT. HE (GEN. CROWDER) IS AT HEART A MILITARY AUTOCRAT. (CONG. REC., AUG. 20, 1919, P. 4338.)

Answer.—Although it is impossible to perceive the relevancy of this issue to the subject of "Military justice," Senator Chamberlain has injected the issue into that controversy and made it the subject of a personal attack. If Senator Chamberlain had consulted his own files, he would have known how far afield he had been carried, and also that the War Department project was silent on the subject of how selective-service boards should be constituted, except in so far as section 5 of that project, authorizing the President to utilize the services of any or all departments, or any or all officers or agents of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, in the execution of that act, foreshadowed the plan of the War Department to constitute local boards consisting of local officials to execute the law.

But while the War Department project was silent on that subject, except as above indicated, the War Department plan of execution was not. That plan was completed prior to April 10, 1917, of which fact there is to be found proof in an official record which had been made nearly two years before this charge of Senator Chamberlain was made.

I refer here to a statement in the report of the Provost Marshal General of December 20, 1917, page 9, where it is stated that the specific task of working out the details of the general plan of execution of the selective-service law was formulated and approved on April 10, 1917. To show conclusively and by the same kind of record proof that I contemplated decentralized local administration by local boards prior to any expression from Congress on the subject, I have only to quote from a letter confidentially communicated to the governors of the several States on April 23, 1917, and formulated some days prior to that date, the following paragraph:

While the class from which soldiers are to come is to be segregated by draft, the law is careful to provide for avoiding the misery that war brings to dependents at home and for a choice of those whose military service the Nation most needs and whose civil and domestic service can best be spared. The important duty of making the selection from the drafted class can best be performed by a permanent board in each county composed of citizens who can be relied upon to execute this solemn function with even justice and with apprehension of its gravity. This board should control the process of selection from its earliest steps, and therefore it must supervise the registration. For the sake of uniformity, for the elimination of expense, and for further and self-evident consideration, it would be prescribed that this board be composed of the sheriff, who would act as its executive officer; the county clerk, who would be custodian of its records; and the county physician, who would serve as surgeon and pass upon the physical fitness of those who are selected for service.

(See Report of Provost Marshal General, Dec. 20, 1917, p. 8.)

This would seem to be unimpeachable evidence that the War Department, not later than April 10 and before Congress had much opportunity to consider this legislation, had formulated that very plan of supervised decentralization which would place the execution of the law in close touch with the civil population. Undoubtedly Members of Congress entertained the same view. The fact that members of the House Military Committee entertained these views is amply attested in a series of hearings conducted by that committee upon the typewritten War Department project between April 7 and April 17. (Hearings on selective-service act before House Committee on Military Affairs, pp. 63-64, 93-95, 105, 120, 131-132, 156, 285, 301, 307.) In many places in these hearings apprehension is expressed by members of the committee against a Federalized draft, but I can speak positively only as to my own state of mind. I had never contemplated other than a decentralized draft executed by the people themselves. I have no doubt but that many Members of Congress entertained the same view. I did not borrow my idea from them, and neither did they borrow their ideas from me.

(c.) CHARGE—THAT COL. WARREN AND NOT GEN. CROWDER, WAS RESPONSIBLE FOR THE CIVILIAN COMPOSITION OF THE SELECTIVE-SERVICE BOARDS.

Senator Chamberlain says: Did Gen. Crowder come before the conferees to assist them? Not at all. It was recognized by some of the members of that committee, at least, that Gen. Crowder was not the man to undertake to popularize that measure. The man who was called into consultation was Mr. Charles Warren. * * * I am suggesting the fact that the man who was sent before the committee for the purpose of assisting in perfecting this bill and bringing the local communities into touch with the Military Establishment was a civilian lawyer of distinction from Detroit, Mich., as I have before stated; and I want to pay him the compliment of saying here and now that there never was a man who appeared before the committee who tried harder that it will not be the judgment of this committee to set up a limited review. We have got the whole review. The convening authority below can weigh both questions of law and fact when he comes to act, and so, too, should the President have this power.

Senator LENROOT. The reviewing authority, I quite agree with you, has full power to measure questions of fact; but again, the convening authority must rely upon a judge advocate when it comes to questions of law, and not exercise his own judgment.

Gen. CROWDER. Yes, he should.

Senator LENROOT. That is the difficulty for me.

Gen. CROWDER. But it has not proved a practical difficulty. In judging of the personnel of your proposed court of appeals, it is important to bear in mind that about 90 per cent of the cases coming before that court are military cases. It is unreasonable to assume that any but military men could judge of the weight or relevancy of the evidence in determining the conduct of a man upon the field of battle, where the evidence is strategical or tactical and wholly military. The issues are those which only a military man who has been trained in those matters can understand. How could a civilian understand and judge of the conditions of battle in the Argonne so as to fix responsibility for failure of a division or Army commander, or even a colonel of a line regiment?

Senator LENROOT. I am not speaking of a civilian tribunal. I put my final proposition, of a tribunal the majority of whom should be military men.

Gen. CROWDER. Even in that case the objection that I have previously advanced remains, that when we shut the President off from a final say in such matters, we impair his responsibility, as the constitutional commander in chief, for winning the war; and I feel very certain, if you pass a bill of this kind, that ultimately its constitutionality will go before the Supreme Court.

Senator LENROOT. On this question raised by the Kernan report?

Gen. CROWDER. I am very much afraid, if you undertake to shut the President off from his relations to the discipline of the Army, and shut off commanding generals under him from their relations to the discipline of the Army, by creating a court of appeal with power to conclude them all, that the constitutional question raised by the Kernan-O'Ryan-Ogden Board will ultimately come before the Supreme Court for settlement, and in a case which will be very embarrassing, because the case will be identified with some great national crisis. I have just that to say about the constitutional question.

Senator LENROOT. I have not heretofore expressed any opinion, but I must say that if the view of the Kernan report is correct, I think the sooner it is found out the better. If there is any such autocratic power vested in the President of the United States as commander-in-chief of the Army, beyond the control of Congress, we ought to know it. That is my view of it.

Gen. CROWDER. Well, I have not based my opposition on constitutional grounds.

Senator LENROOT. I know that you have not, at all.

Gen. CROWDER. I preferred to rest the whole question upon what is best for the Army.

Senator LENROOT. Yes, I understand.

Gen. CROWDER. And I am willing to assume the constitutionality of legislation of that character.

Senator LENROOT. Yes.

Gen. CROWDER. And my only purpose there was to say that I have no doubt in time of some great crisis, the constitutional question will arise.

Take the question of the President convening the court. I did not emphasize that in my application of the law. Suppose that he, instead of a subordinate commander, is the convening authority, and then consider the President submitting to a court judge advocate below, and to a military court of appeals here, the question of whether some field commander or some division commander or corps commander in the battle of the Argonne has failed to do his part.

Senator LENROOT. Well, that all goes to two questions. One involves, of course, the question of whether the Constitution applies at all, which you discussed somewhat, and, secondly, whether the President is governed not only by law but by common principles of justice—whether there are any limitations upon him. If there be such, I see no more reason why, upon questions of law, he should not be governed by a military tribunal as Commander in Chief; he certainly is, just as a civil officer is, by the very men that he appoints to the bench, and they control his action and find his action invalid in a given case.

Gen. CROWDER. Of course, everybody sees that point instantly upon its being mentioned; but what would be the effect in the end, I am asking, what would be the effect upon efficiency if the man he appointed would have the right to control and nullify his action as Commander in Chief?

Senator LENROOT. If he did not obey the law, if he violated the law, I do not know why he should not be subject, as Commander in Chief, to nullification of any action in violation of law.

Gen. CROWDER. I am afraid this question of military relations is sui generis and that it does not aid you much to invoke the analogies of our civil jurisprudence.

Senator LENROOT. Well, take this case: Under existing law, take the case of the President convening a court, as you suggest. Supposing that the President should undertake to convene a court in violation of the Articles of War. Do you not think habeas corpus would lie to a civil court?

Gen. CROWDER. Unquestionably; and when the privilege of this writ is not suspended it would be effective.

Senator LENROOT. Do you not think that the civil courts therefore, to that extent, would have the control of the action of the President, even though he is Commander in Chief?

Gen. CROWDER. Oh, of course.

Senator LENROOT. So that to that extent now the courts may control the action of the President as Commander in Chief.

Gen. CROWDER. Yes; controlled by habeas corpus, but as to jurisdiction only.

Before I conclude my testimony I wish to call the attention of this subcommittee to a matter and see what my responsibility is. If I stop here I shall leave many matters uncovered which this committee has admitted as in some way relevant, and most of them the accus-

tions of a single witness, Gen. Ansell. Illustrative of the intemperate general character of these accusations, I cite the following as examples:

1. Against generals of the Army:

- (a) "The weakest grade in the Army of the United States" (p. 121), which is the grade from which are drawn convening and reviewing authorities of courts-martial;
- (b) "Many of them, jokes to everybody else in the world except ourselves and themselves" (p. 121);
- (c) "Lacking in experience" (p. 121), citing Gens. Pershing and Wood as examples, and saying:
- (d) "That heterogeneous collection of troops on the Mexican border" "which Gen. Pershing commanded"; "no professional soldier would ever call that a division" (p. 122); and "the command in the Philippines was not the kind of command that required general leadership" (p. 122); and again,
- (e) "I have had a hundred times their court-martial experience" (p. 121).

2. Against the Inspector General:

- (a) "Thoroughly reactionary" (p. 116); "the most reactionary of men"; "prejudiced and reactionary" (p. 173); "whose views savor of professional absolutism" (p. 123).
- (b) With trying to browbeat and intimidate Gen. Ansell in connection with the investigation of Gen. Ansell's part in the present controversy; in trying to compel Gen. Ansell to make a statement against his will by threatening that "this thing is in Congress, and my report will go to Congress, and, Ansell, when it gets to Congress, it will be very detrimental to you" (p. 209).
- (c) With habitually using the power of his office in connection with investigations to compel accused persons and others to make statements against their will and to incriminate themselves by menaces, threats, and intimidation (p. 209).
- (d) With allowing officers in his department in camp and division to compel testimony from suspected or accused soldiers, and then use it against them (p. 209).
- (e) With having taken part with the Secretary of War and the Acting Judge Advocate General (Gen. Kregar) in frequent conferences with the court-martial committee of the American Bar Association under such circumstances that "I, for one, as long as I live, will not express any respect for any such committee, no matter how high it may be or whatever association it may be a part of" (p. 214).

3. Against Gen. Biddle, former Assistant Chief of Staff:

- (a) "Thoroughly reactionary" (p. 116);
- (b) Sharing with the Inspector General in views that "savor of professional absolutism" (p. 123).

4. Against Maj. Gen. Kernan, Maj. Gen. O'Ryan, and Lieut. Col. Ogden—the members of the Kernan-O'Ryan-Ogden Board—and Lieut. Col. Barrows, the recorder of that board:

- (a) "The most reactionary set of men in the United States" (p. 215).
- (b) So prejudiced, and known to be so prejudiced, that many officers of high rank holding liberal views refused to express their views on military justice to that board (p. 215).

5. Against former President Taft—not admitted to the record, but illustrating the intemperate and irresponsible character of these accusations:

- (a) Perverting "his power to the furtherance of a plan * * * to maintain the existing vicious system of military justice, and to do me great personal injury" (statement of Gen. Ansell, New York World, Sept. 16, 1919);
- (b) Abusing "the confidence and trust of the American people" and "misleading them" (ibid.); and
- (c) Debasing "his exalted position as ex-President of the Republic to become an ignorant and bitter partisan in behalf of his friend," Gen. Crowder (ibid.).

There is also a formidable list of accusations against the court-martial committee of the American Bar Association, but particularly against the Secretary of War and myself. The list is a long one. Certain of these accusations carry their own refutation.

to note in this letter of February 12, 1919, in the discussion of a single court-martial case, the fact that the original finding of the court had been "not guilty," but that on revision the court had changed this finding of "not guilty" to a finding of "guilty."

It is true that the first draft of my letter of February 12, sent to Senator Chamberlain, omitted any mention of the changed finding of the court from "not guilty" to "guilty," but it is likewise true that this was noted the next day by me and a corrected copy sent to the War Department for transmission to Senator Chamberlain.

It is also true that eight days before Senator Chamberlain gave out this denunciatory interview, namely, on February 26, 1919, I specifically called his attention to the correction in my letter of February 12, 1919. (Hearings before Senate Military Affairs Committee on S. 5320, 65th Cong., 3d sess., p. 282.)

It is also true that on March 4, 1919, two days before the appearance of this denunciatory interview, my said letter of February 12 was published in the Congressional Record in its corrected form. (Cong. Rec., Mar. 4, 1919; pp. 5257-5265.)

The unquestionable fact is, therefore, that on March 6, 1919, Senator Chamberlain gave out this denunciatory interview branding the statements in my letter of February 12 as "erroneous and false:" and that on that date he referred to this omission above set forth as an example of "wholly incorrect" statement, although he had three prior notices, two of them personal notices, that this "wholly incorrect" statement, had been admitted by me and promptly corrected.

The other criticism that he made of my letter of February 12 was that I had there stated that the judge advocate on the camp commander's staff (Lieut. Col. William Taylor) who had passed on this same case was a civilian lawyer, fresh from civil practice. As a matter of fact this judge advocate had entered the Army from civil practice during the Spanish-American War. In the rush of preparing the data for my letter of February 12, Lieut. Col. Taylor had been confused with Maj. Orville Taylor, a Reserve Corps judge advocate, who had just entered the service from civil life. This error was noted by me the very next day (February 13) and corrected in the revised letter of that date. And on February 21 the Secretary of War, at my request, notified Senator Chamberlain by letter of this error and called attention to the correction. Indeed, it is doubtful whether Senator Chamberlain would ever have noticed this error at all had it not been for my open admission and voluntary correction of it. This erroneous statement did not appear in the letter of February 12 as published in the Congressional Record of March 4. Yet in spite of the fact that, apparently, Senator Chamberlain did not discover this error until the Secretary of War called his attention to it, at my request, and in spite of the fact that he knew the correction had been made at least 13 days before his statement appeared in the press on March 6, he described my letter as containing "so many misstatements of fact" that he did not make it public because he did not care to "embarrass the Secretary by having him stand sponsor and be responsible for such erroneous and false statements."

Senator Chamberlain, at the time of his speech in the Senate, August 18, had had in his possession my letter of February 12 for a period of over six months. He has entered the general allegation of "erroneous and false statements," but he has never, so far as I know, particularized but two, and those two are fully explained above.

II. GEN. ANSELL'S CHARGES AGAINST GEN. CROWDER.

(A.) GEN. ANSELL'S CHARGE THAT HE WAS RELIEVED OF ALL DUTIES AND RESPONSIBILITIES IN CONNECTION WITH THE ADMINISTRATION OF MILITARY JUSTICE AFTER NOVEMBER, 1917.

Gen. Ansell's letter to Congressman Burnett, February 17, 1919, (Cong. Rec., Feb. 19, 1919, p. 3982.) · Gen. Ansell's testimony on the hearings on S. 64 (p. 173).

Gen. Ansell wrote to Congressman Burnett:

Thereupon (upon filing the brief as to the meaning of the word revise as used in R. S., sec. 1199) I was relieved of my duties in connection with the administration of military justice, and these were taken over by the Judge Advocate General in person. Consequently, from the middle of November, 1917, to the middle of July, 1918, I was not charged with any duty or responsibility in connection with the administration of military justice, nor was I consulted either by the Secretary of War or the Judge Advocate General upon matters affecting military justice.

He testified before this subcommittee:

After I had filed my opinion insisting upon subjecting courts-martial to legal regulation, in November, 1917, the Judge Advocate General of the Army came back, took charge, relieved me from all connection with military justice, except, of course, when he was away for any period some one had to act, and I acted; but I mean to say that I was relieved of all authority to act while he was there. (P. 173.)

Answer.—The truth is to the contrary, that Gen. Ansell continued his duties in connection with military justice after November, 1917, and until his departure for Europe in April, 1918, as senior assistant in the office, in the same way and with the same responsibility as prior to November, 1917.

Col. E. G. Davis, during that time chief of the military justice division of the office, testified on the hearings on S. 5320 before the Senate Military Affairs Committee on February 26, 1919 (p. 204):

That statement (Gen. Ansell's statement in his letter to Congressman Purnett, above quoted) "is not correct, for the reason that all these cases continued to pass through his hands. He signed many of them himself, as acting Judge Advocate General, and actually exercised the discretion of deciding what, if any, of the cases went on to Gen. Crowder for his action. Gen. Ansell exercised final authority on such cases during November, December, January, February, and March, except where he did not want to take the responsibility of determining a particular case himself.

The Inspector General of the Army, after examining officers connected with the military justice division of my office during the period in question and the reviews of the courts-martial cases prepared during the period from November, 1917, to Gen. Ansell's departure for France in April, 1918 (finding over twice as many signed during that period by Gen. Ansell as by Gen. Crowder), said in his report to the Secretary of War, May 8, 1919 (p. 26):

From the records and from all obtainable evidence it appears that Gen. Ansell's statement that from November, 1917, to April, 1918, he had nothing to do with the administration of military justice and that the proceedings did not come over his desk, is not in accord with the facts.

An examination of the records in my office shows Gen. Ansell's signature appended to 105 written reviews of general courts-martial cases, dated between November 16, 1917, and April 9, 1918, as against 36 signed by Gen. Crowder. The balance, 436 in number, cases of less importance, bear the signature of Col. Davis or his assistant Lieut. Col. Clark.

(B.) GEN. ANSELL'S CHARGE THAT HE WAS AGAIN RELIEVED FROM ALL CONNECTION WITH THE ADMINISTRATION OF MILITARY JUSTICE AFTER THE ARMISTICE.

Gen. Ansell's testimony before this subcommittee (Hearings on S. 64, p. 183).

Gen. Ansell said:

After the armistice the Judge Advocate General returned to the office and more largely assumed the reins, and the first thing that the Judge Advocate General of the Army did again was to relieve me from all contact with and supervision over military justice. The truth of the matter is, of course, that he and the department did not like my liberal views. They will not say it, but their conduct speaks far louder than any words.

Answer.—The truth of the matter is quite to the contrary. On resuming charge of the office obviously a division of the work between Gen. Ansell and myself became necessary in the interest of expedition of business and a proper division of the burden. In order to get quickly in touch with the much assailed department of military justice, I gave directions that court-martial records be routed direct to my desk and other matters direct to Gen. Ansell's desk; but I never failed to send to him important records for his opinion. In addition (1) Gen. Ansell was made president of the clemency board, a matter of the very first importance in which he was greatly interested and which necessarily absorbed his time; (2) Gen. Ansell remained senior assistant in the office, upon whom devolved the duty and responsibility for all matters relating to military justice, as well as to other matters in the office whenever Gen. Crowder was not personally present, and, even when Gen. Crowder was personally present, Gen. Ansell remained in charge of more important disciplinary matters; (3) this relation continued undisturbed until after Gen. Ansell by his unwarranted personal attacks in his letter to Congressman Burnett, published February 19, 1919, had created an impossible situation; (4) Gen. Ansell himself said of this matter while it was fresh in his mind, in his testimony, February 15, 1919, before the Senate Military Affairs Committee, in the hearings on S. 5320 (p. 146):

An order was published routing all matters affecting military justice through other channels * * * maybe 10 days ago, I imagine. But I think it ought to be said that there is always a question as to what work is going to come to me or through me, and it was well within the province of the Judge Advocate General to decide such a matter, without any desire whatever to prevent my supervision of the administration of military justice. I do not believe that the publication of the order by the Judge Advocate General was designed to prevent my supervision of the administration of military justice, but rather done in the due course of administration and the division of work.

As to Gen. Ansell's statement that "he and the department did not like my liberal views," (1) Gen. Ansell held many views with which I did not concur; I did, however, appreciate his ability and energy. Although his views were well known to me, I retained him as my senior assistant in charge of the office in my absence; (2) my high opinion of his ability and my liberal attitude toward his differing views were testified in the order issued a few days later (G. O. No. 18, War Department, Jan. 27, 1919), upon my recommendation, awarding Gen. Ansell the distinguished service medal, which, condensing the substance of my letter of recommendation, awards him the medal "for especially meritorious and conspicuous service as Acting Judge Advocate General of the Army, whose broad and constructive interpretations of law and regulations have greatly facilitated the conduct of the war and military administration."

(C.) GEN. ANSELL'S CHARGES AGAINST THE ADMINISTRATION OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL'S OFFICE.

Gen. Ansell says:

If there was ever one institution in the world that really ought to be thoroughly investigated, in my judgment, it is the Office of the Judge Advocate General of the Army. (P. 162.)

Injustice reigns supreme in the bureau of military justice itself. (P. 162.)

The Judge Advocate General's department is no longer a place of certain and assured justice. All too frequently it is a department given over to base wrong and tyranny, and the oppression of the men and officers who serve in it, and of the Army at large.

I am going far enough into this question of administration to show, I think, that justice is jockeyed around in that department, and it has been degraded to serve the personal purposes of an imperious master, the Judge Advocate General himself. (P. 172.)

Answer.—This language contrasts strangely with the gratuitous statement made by Gen. Ansell as late as July 8, 1918, and contained in the report of his trip abroad, as follows:

In passing, I should like to say and considering the nature of this report I think that with entire propriety I may say, that as a result of my observations and study here I have been surprisingly struck with the prevision with which the Office of the Judge Advocate General of our Army has been administered for the past several years, including the period of this war. Without particular opportunities for so doing, and without the advantage of actual war experiences had here, it has anticipated necessities of administration which as a rule only experience develops; and, more remarkable still, there is a surprising consonance between the principles of administration which our office had recommended to be adopted and which doubtless in the end will be adopted in the department and those principles which are found to be an approved basic part of the military administration of the allied nations.

As to this matter the Inspector General found (Inspector General's report of May 8, 1919, to the Secretary of War, p. 57):

It is believed that the Judge Advocate General's Department has functioned during the war with the interests and rights of the enlisted men constantly in mind, and that the various steps taken and the measures adopted have been for the single purpose of safeguarding those interests and rights. It has been successful, except in a few isolated instances, in accomplishing that purpose.

I should welcome an investigation of my office. I think I may confidently rest upon the record it has made.

(D) CHARGE.—THE ALLEGED "PROPAGANDA BUREAU."

Charge.—The following excerpts appear in Gen. Ansell's testimony before the Senate committee.

Mr. ANSELL. They met, these three men, and they decided upon a plan of campaign to maintain and defend the existing system at all costs and discredit the complaints and destroy the complainants. (P. 166.)

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Who were the men? You mentioned them a while ago. (P. 166.)

Mr. ANSELL. They were Mr. Baker, Gen. Crowder, and Prof. Wigmore. The first thing done publicly was a statement for the press, devoted largely to discrediting me. * * * Now, they got together and published this document accusing me of wanting to succeed, and wanting to succeed by surreptitious methods, and gave it to the papers—the Associated Press and all of them—all timed for the usual Monday morning fulmination. It had been held there two or three days and sent out everywhere, with great headlines, about me. All of this was done by the Secretary of War, who invited it by writing a letter to Gen. Crowder as a vehicle upon which this letter to Gen. Crowder could travel. He said, "Please make the statement immediately." And the statement was made immediately that the system was splendid; that it had virtues that few human institutions have; and then it devoted itself largely to destroying me for bringing to the public, as I have had to do, the situation. And then, not content with what they gave to the press, but in accordance with the plan, they published this 70-page document here, which was an elaboration of the statement that was given to the press, in itself a long one, written by Prof. Wigmore. (Pp. 166-167-168.)

This conference between the Secretary, Gen. Crowder, and Prof. Wigmore that I told you about, established a propaganda bureau, in which Prof. Wigmore was the chief. There were several officers and 13 or 14 clerks assigned solely for this purpose, and the Government of the United States paid their salaries. (P. 168.)

The bureau got out this very elaborate statement, which is devoted to encomiums upon the system, and then concludes, as the other did, by calling the attention of the public to my surreptitious conduct, adding here another gross example of "surreptition" (p. 168).

That lengthy pamphlet was gotten out. There were 90,000 copies of this pamphlet published and sent to all the lawyers, preachers, and other professional men as part of the propaganda to maintain this system and to discredit those who would attack it. I wish to say to you, Mr. Chairman, that the records of the cases cited will prove that the Secretary of War and the Judge Advocate General of the Army have resorted to methods which, if adopted by a man in his dealings with another man privately, would merit and receive the severest condemnation (pp. 168-169).

Answer.—These several quoted statements, in so far as they charge me with any part in this propaganda work, are wholly untrue. I had no more to do with it than did Gen. Ansell and Senator Chamberlain, both of whom have accused me of a leading part in it. More than that, in a conference with the Secretary of War, held between March 10 and March 14, when we had this so-called Wigmore letter before us, it was expressly agreed that the letter should be placed upon the files of the War Department as a complete refutation of charges made, and to limit publication to what is found in my letter of March 8, published in Official Bulletin of March 10, and I left for Cuba on or about the latter date with that firm understanding. It was not until April 4 that I learned of the large publication and distribution of this letter. I was then at Habana, Cuba; and perhaps the best proof that I can give of my attitude toward this whole matter is by inserting here a letter which I wrote of that date to Gen. Kreger, who was representing me in the office.

FIFTH FLOOR, ROBINS BUILDING.

Habana, Cuba, April 4, 1919.

Personal and confidential.

MY DEAR KREGER: I am in receipt of a personal letter from Maj. Miller this morning dated March 29, inclosing copy of a public document issued out of the Government Printing Office, same being a reprint of my letter of March 10, 1919.

The matter of publishing this letter came up before I left Washington when I learned that a copy of it was in the hands of the Secretary of War before I had read it, being left with him by Col. Wigmore. As you know, the letter was prepared by Wigmore and Bigby, but largely by the former. Wigmore and I had a rather unpleasant conversation about his action in going direct to the Secretary of War with this communication. I think I remember the facts correctly. Wigmore told me that he had won the assent of the Secretary of War to its publication and distribution. I told him that such a step would be such a departure in military administration that it was not to be thought of, and that the expenditure of public funds for such a purpose could not in my judgment be defended. I expressed a doubt as to whether the auditor would pass the voucher for the publication of the letter for such distribution. Wigmore acknowledged the irregularity of his action in going over my head to the Secretary but expressed the view that he could not sit by and see the case fail for lack of presentation to the public. I would not yield my assent to publication and left Washington with the facts just as I have stated. I hope I am not dim in my recollection of the occurrences I have attempted to narrate.

In view of what I have stated, you will understand my surprise to receive this pamphlet and a statement by Miller that a hundred thousand copies were being mailed by the Provost Marshal General's Office; where they got their mailing list I do not know.

Had I been present in Washington I should have strenuously opposed the publication, if for no other reason than the events which have occurred since I left Washington furnish; namely, the refusal by the Secretary of War to give Gen. Ansell's letter of reply to my letter of March 8, published in the Official Bulletin March 10, any publicity. Now comes along this publication, which involves some reiteration of what I said in the other letter and is certain to aggravate the situation both within the department and before Congress and the country. It insures, in my judgment, a turmoil for the next six months or a year.

Had I been compelled to yield my assent, I should have asked for the elimination of the part commencing "As to the second point," on page 53, and ending on page 62 with the second paragraph of that page, with, of course, those modifications in the remaining part of the text necessary to conform that part to this elision. Published in that way it would have been a straight explanation of the system of military justice, with recommendations as to what improvements ought to be made, and nothing more. The inclusion of the 10 pages, the elision of which I would have made, presents the personal issues and impairs the primary use of the document.

I thought I would like to have this explanation in your hands for your own guidance in answering any questions that may be directed to you. I hope I have stated the facts in all fairness to Wigmore.

Very truly, yours,

E. H. CROWDER.

Brig. Gen. E. A. KREGER,
Room 606, Mills Building, Washington, D. C.

E) GEN. ANSELL'S CHARGE THAT GEN. CROWDER FAILED TO FORWARD TO THE SECRETARY OF WAR GEN. ANSELL'S REPORT OF HIS EUROPEAN TRIP.

Charge.—Gen. Ansell said in his letter February 17, 1919, to Congressman Burnett (Cong. Rec. Feb. 19, 1919, p. 3983):

Returning from Europe in the middle of July, whither I had gone the April before for the purpose of studying the military administration of our Allies, I filed with the Judge Advocate General a report, which, among other things, treated especially of the administration of military justice in France, Italy, and England, and which indicated those elements of their systems which I believed to be better than our own, and suggested our own weaknesses. This report never reached the Secretary of War.

Gen. Ansell repeated this charge before this subcommittee (p. 174).

Answer.—In truth Gen. Ansell's orders to proceed abroad did not contemplate any examination of the administration of military justice. He himself wrote every order that he received. The convincing answer, therefore, may come from the official record he himself has made. His first letter on the subject of his trip was written as early as July 25, 1917. Certainly his orders gave me no information that his report was any broader than the instructions he had written for himself, and which I had approved, and therefore no information that it had any relevancy to the administration of military justice. This information came to me when I was accused of the suppression of that report. I then sent for the report, which I had never seen. After some delay a carbon copy was brought to me. I asked for the original. This was, after even greater delay, brought to me with the statement that it was found on Gen. Ansell's desk.

I submit herewith all I can find on the files respecting this trip abroad of Gen. Ansell, in order that the committee may form an independent judgment as to the extent to which I was apprised that it dealt at all with the subject of military justice:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL,
Washington, July 25, 1917.

Personal memorandum for the Secretary of War.

Especially at this time—and I am sure you will agree—it is the plain duty of a subordinate to make to you such suggestions based upon his daily experience and observation as will help in the better administration of the department and to a more efficient Military Establishment.

In the performance of my daily duties in this office during this war I have met with certain deficiencies which doubtless have considerable effect upon general military administration and which, if I do not exaggerate them, we must, as we can, readily remedy. I shall summarize the several and rather unrelated subjects thus:

1. The failure of this office primarily, the War Department, and the entire Government to inform itself and act advisedly in the light of the war law and administration of Great Britain, Canada, and France.

2. The failure of the War Department to appreciate the legal relation of this bureau to all military administration as the same is established and required to be recognized by law.

3. The unfair and injurious attitude of the department to the personnel of this bureau.

I. Long before we entered this war I took up with the head of this office the necessity of our keeping in touch with the war legislation and administration of Great Britain and Canada especially, and of France as well. At that time we contented ourselves with a rather perfunctory and unstimulated effort. I gathered some things through the State Department, and spent several half days down in the Library of Congress, and, through friends in the large universities, got in touch with university current library literature upon this subject. Since that time, in a perfunctory sort of way, I have kept up, through British law notes and like journals, with the general commentaries upon such law and administration. We are now in the war, and doubtless will have to consider, if not adopt, a course of law and administration parallel to that of our English allies, and should give thorough consideration to the much more scientific and effective effort of the French. If it were important for us to keep in touch with such national activities before we entered the war, it is imperative that we do so now. Doubtless the war law and administration of certain of the allied countries—particularly Great Britain, and to a lesser degree France—can be found in the Congressional Library and other sources of information in this country, and with considerable labor be gathered together and some estimate made of the whole. This gathering of the material, however, would be uncertain and unsatisfactory, and would give us no information of the effects of the legislation. Much of what has been done has been tried, tested, and found wanting, and much practice and experience have proved good. Assuming that we can produce the various parts of the legislation, of its effects there is as yet no literature which is authoritative, complete, or assuredly impartial. We ought to know this law and administration, the necessity back of it, its purposes and objects, and, above all, its results.

Now our Government must necessarily embark on many similar projects, or must at least consider them, and it should do so advisedly. I feel that the entire country is deficient in this knowledge, and that this great war-making department is almost inexcusably so. This department in this regard is not performing the functions that it ought to perform and will have to perform before this country participates effectively in this war. The chief fault is that as a nation and as a department we are proceeding along the old established lines that wars are to be fought by hosts specially trained therefor, and involve only indirectly and remotely the Nation and society at large. This was once so, but is so no longer. One or two or more millions of men can not be put into the field without profoundly disturbing social, economic, and industrial conditions, and this general disturbance is as much a matter of concern to this department as is the conduct of technical military affairs themselves.

A thousand and one questions ought to be considered, and this department should be ready with helpful views and advice. Indeed, we hardly know what the subjects are. We can summon to our minds a few of them which are likely soon to become subjects of consideration in this country—such as moratoriums for those engaged in the military service; separation allowances; government care of dependents; a scheme of insurance to supplant the unscientific American pension system; military requisitions of all kinds; control of telegraphs and telephones; suspension of freight and passenger traffic; control of resident aliens; press control; control of infectious diseases; the support of nonemployed; food conservation; judicial process as affecting those in the military service; trading with the enemy and suspension of private commerce with them; litigation and adjustment of judicial work to the situation of war; and a thousand and one phases of the problem of adjusting ordinary civil rights to the law and military exigency.

I say this department is not at all familiar with the conduct and experience of the other belligerents in these matters. We ought to be. This office particularly ought to be. I feel the need of such information every day. Though we are in the war, in some respects we are as far removed from it as Mars. We are not abreast of war activities; we lack current knowledge and information which is easily obtainable; we have not the facts which can serve as the basis of views that are worth while. We can not rely upon past experience; this war is sui generis, and must be understood as such.

I believe that the quickest and best way of getting these facts is to send several trained officers and investigators to London, Paris, and Ottawa, who should acquaint themselves with what has been done and get the opinions as to the merits of the various legal and administrative steps taken. In this way local color, atmosphere and public opinion will all register their effects. Such a commission should stay, I should say, a month in London, living in and with the administration that is there taking place, and perhaps a lesser time in Paris and Ottawa. They should then come back here prepared to state the facts with respect to the law and administration taken by the allied countries to our own Government, and to express informative and valuable views upon them.

I have talked over this subject with Maj. Wigmore, of this department, and as well with the Judge Advocate General himself. I think both agree with my views. Maj. Wigmore took the matter up with the Librarian of Congress, and has a letter from that authority, which I here quote:

"MY DEAR MAJOR: I was interested in your inquiry this morning, but impressed anew by the situation and the need which it reveals. What your office wants is, first, of course, the war legislation enacted in foreign countries, but also, secondly, the effects of this legislation.

"Now, as to certain of the countries, particularly Great Britain, and to a lesser degree France, we can produce the legislation, but of its effects, there is, as yet, no literature in our possession which is authoritative, complete, or assuredly impartial. An occasional article in a periodical, to be sure, on some particular phase; but with what bias composed can only be guessed.

"Now our Government is necessarily to embark on many similar projects of legislation or, at all events, to discuss them, and Congress will undoubtedly demand information not merely as to the legislation actually enacted abroad, but as to its effects, and it will not be content with a mere characterization of these as 'good' or 'bad.'

"Later on, studies and conclusions will doubtless appear in print, which will be adequate for the historian, but our legislators can not wait for their appearance. I believe that the one sound and practical method is to send a commission abroad to make some first-hand studies (see note <sup>1</sup>) and direct inquiries. An attempt to secure the data through our embassies or consulates, especially if based upon careful questionnaire, might yield some useful return, but any attempt at long distance and by correspondence merely, which rested solely upon the regular staff at these already overpressed offices, is not likely to yield adequate results. The inquirers themselves should be men with special training. Only such men have sufficient familiarity with the literature, the way of using it, and the method of formulating the inquiry. Only they could get at the essentials in the short time available, and could avoid being clouded by the nonessentials.

"There must be many such men available from the universities, at least between now and October 1, who are only too anxious to do some war service. They could readily be drafted in for it.

"I have been induced to note the above because, though your inquiry this morning is the actual occasion, we have already, during the months past and from various angles, had ample proof of the need.

"In determining the field to be covered, however, and the qualifications desirable in the investigator, there should not be overlooked any projects underway in other Government establishments—for instance, the Department of Commerce, the Department of Agriculture, the Tariff Board, etc.—whose object may be the acquisition of data within the section of the field with which their activities are concerned.

"Faithfully, yours,

"HERBERT PUTNAM, Librarian."

I also quote one to me from Maj. Wigmore, as follows:

"I visited the Congressional Library this morning. Here is the book (my own copy) of which I spoke to you. The Congressional Library contains the same, with Volumes II and III also to 1916. Also the Library has a different series covering the same ground to 1917, in 14 small volumes. Also it has the English Manual of Emergency Legislation in serial parts to 1916, followed by a new series, of which one volume is now on hand, entitled 'Defense of the Realm Act and Regulations Thereunder.'

"Neither for France nor for England are there any treatises or reports on the effect of such legislation.

"I consulted my old friend, Herbert Putnam, Librarian; and he stated that he has for some time been convinced that such a mission as you propose should be sent. He is writing me a memorandum about it to hand to you.

<sup>1</sup> NOTE.—Not necessarily elaborate first-hand studies in the field, but studies of data which might be secured by direct contact with the operating bureaus of the Government.

"Also I lunched with Ambassador Spring-Rice at the Cosmos Club, and asked him whether he knew of any reports on the effect of the British legislation. He did not. His opinion was that the only way to learn the facts would be to send an agent to inquire, first, however, equipping him with a definite series of questions on which it was desired to ascertain the conclusions of English experience."

With my present information I can only see the task in vague outline, but I am absolutely assured of the advisability, even necessity, of undertaking it. I am also convinced that it is too big a task for one man, and that, as suggested by Mr. Putnam, trained investigators and skilled legalists should be called to our assistance.

In proceeding to the work, first the grounds here at home should be covered. That will enable one to get a comprehension of the task and to gather points to which he will direct his inquiries. Then the commission should take to the field, by which I mean should take up its investigation in London, Paris, and Ottawa.

If it will make my suggestion appear as disinterested as it is, permit me to say that I am not an applicant for a position on this commission should it be appointed.

II. This bureau and its official personnel are the legal advisers to the Secretary of War, to all bureaus and officers of the department, and to the Army itself. Such is the relation established by law. The function of this bureau ought not to be, and safely can not be, ignored or minimized. There is no need or reason for ignoring or in any degree denying its functions or seeking to establish it extra legally elsewhere. And yet this is what is being done. Since this war began I have seen grow up in many of the bureaus of this department unofficial and extra legal law officers—lawyers who are commissioned, for instance, as reserve officers of the particular bureau, having no qualification for the work of that bureau and commissioned therein only to perform for it work which belongs to this bureau. It is an abuse of the appointing power so to use the Reserve Corps. If any bureau needs legal advice, the law requires that it be sought here; and this bureau can and will supply it reliably and expeditiously. The Judge Advocate General's Department has a reserve section to which the best legal talent of the country can gain admission. Such a system of supplying legal aid has given rise, as naturally it must, to uncoordinated legal direction and embarrassment, the extent of which is best known to this office, but the effect of which throughout the field of administration can not be lost. Congress has established one law bureau in this department. It certainly has not been found wanting; indeed, surely, it has proved helpful and has put every ounce of its effort behind correct departmental administration. There can be no reason, in fact, for attempting to disintegrate its functions. While I assume that such is not the desire of the department, such is inevitably the result of the present tendency of each bureau to furnish its own law officers. There is but one Judge Advocate General's Department; it is unlawful, unwise, and unsafe to attempt to create and rely upon others.

III. (a) The staff rank of the officers of this department has been placed on a grade below that of other staff officers. This has wrought a great injustice to the worthy officers of this department and is bound to have an injurious effect upon the legal administration of the Army. I know this discrimination has been made through the ignorance of line officers of the General Staff who can have no accurate comprehension of the importance of a judge advocate's work. The action, initially, was taken hastily and ill-advisedly. The merits of the proposition were not considered properly, if at all. No officer of this department was heard or consulted, yet this office has never been able to get a reconsideration of a matter which is vital to this department and must result detrimentally to the Army.

(b) This is in line with the recent ruling of the department to exclude all permanent staff officers from eligibility for appointment in the National Army. That rule is unlawful. The statute renders us eligible to command, and it is not within the lawful power of this department to render us ineligible. We can be rendered ineligible only by an arbitrariness that is unjustifiable in law, does an injustice to all whom it affects, has its entire basis in prejudice, and can result only detrimentally to the Army. Not only is it unlawful, it is even more unwise.

S. T. A.

MARCH 20, 1918.

Gen. CROWDER (personal):

1. I am now ready to start at any time on the proposed journey for the study of the Allies war laws and administration. I think my departure should be hastened.

2. More time will be required than I first reckoned. A rough estimate is: One week at Ottawa; 3 or four weeks at London; 3 or 4 weeks at Paris; 2 weeks in conference with our own authorities, military and civil. About 20 days will be consumed in ocean travel going and returning. I could leave for Ottawa almost immediately.

3. I have from time to time had conferences with members of the various foreign missions here, whereby I am satisfied I better know what is needed, and how to get it. Maj. Innes, of the British Embassy, has been the soul of courtesy, very interested, and very helpful. With great kindness he has offered to place his chambers at the Inns at my disposal.

4. My information is that the volume and the character of the work, together with the difficulty of getting the services of a stenographer abroad, will absolutely necessitate my taking along a stenographer from this office. The volume of dictation, copying, and note-taking will make the continuous services of a stenographer indispensable.

5. I am sure I do not exaggerate the benefits that will result from such a tour. There have been missions for everything else, but nothing has been done to acquaint us, especially, with the war laws and administration of the Allies. Indeed, it would be difficult to exaggerate the benefits. I am quite sure that the results of such a tour and study will be helpful to the Government, to the department, and to you, and that it will be especially beneficial and I hope creditable to you, to me, and to this office. I feel that this office, thus prepared, will thereby be enabled to exert greater influence in the department and outside of it.

ANSELL.

MARCH 30, 1918.

Memorandum for The Adjutant General.

Will you please issue travel orders immediately, in letter form, substantially as follows:

Brig. Gen. Samuel T. Ansell, Judge Advocate General's Department, accompanied by Mr. Earle L. Brown, civilian clerk, office of the Judge Advocate General, will proceed not later than April 1, 1918, to Ottawa, Canada, for the purpose of observing the Canadian forces under confidential instructions of the Secretary of War. Upon the completion of this duty both will return to their proper station. The travel, as directed, is necessary in the military service. Mr. Brown will be paid $4 per day in lieu of actual expenses, and the Quartermaster's Department will furnish him the necessary transportation.

S. T. ANSELL,
Brigadier General, National Army.

MARCH 30, 1918.

From: The Adjutant General of the Army.

To: Brig. Gen. Samuel T. Ansell, Judge Advocate General's Department, Washington, D. C.

Subject: Travel orders.

The Secretary of War directs as necessary in the military service that, accompanied by Mr. Earle L. Brown, civilian clerk, you will proceed not later than April 1, 1918, to Ottawa, Canada, for the purpose of observing the Canadian forces, under confidential instructions of the Secretary of War, and upon completion of this duty you and Mr. Brown, will return to your proper station.

Mr. Brown will be paid $4 per day in lieu of actual expenses, and the Quartermaster Department will furnish him the necessary transportation.

Judge Advocate General.WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF STAFF,
Washington, April 17, 1918.

Confidential

Memorandum for The Adjutant General.

The Secretary of War directs that an order in letter form be issued to Gen. S. T. Ansell, directing him to proceed not later than the 20th instant to the port of embarkation at New York and thence to France and such other of the allied countries in Europe as may be found necessary for the purpose of observing the principles and practice of the war laws and administration of the allied countries, in accordance with directions previously given the Judge Advocate General. Upon completion of this duty Gen. Ansell will be directed to return to his proper station.

Report of his observations will be made in writing to the Judge Advocate General of the Army.

Brigadier General, National Army,
Assistant to Acting Chief of Staff.

(F) GEN. ANSELL'S CHARGE THAT GEN. CROWDER OPPOSED GRANTING COUNSEL TO ACCUSED, AND GIVING ACCUSED LEGAL PROTECTION AT THE TRIAL.

Charge.—In Gen. Ansell's testimony before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs (p. 257), he charges that Gen. Crowder, in his testimony before the Committees of Congress on the Revision of 1916, stated:

I must warn you to be careful about injecting into this system these civil principles that give you counsel and protection at every stage of the proceeding, because it will disturb discipline.

Gen. Ansell further says that Gen. Crowder "said that (referring to above quotation) on pages 18, 20, 29, 30, 44, and 48 of the hearings, and repeated it time and time again."

Answer.—Gen. Ansell's statement is not in accord with the facts.

A careful examination of those hearings discloses that neither the statement quoted by Gen. Ansell, nor any statement of similar import, appears either on pages 18, 20, 29, 30 or 44 of the hearings. On page 48 of the hearings, Gen. Crowder, in discussing before the committee a proposition as to whether or not there should be a unanimous verdict by the court in a sentence imposing death, stated—

To require a unanimous vote for the infliction of the death penalty in time of war would be going a long way, I think, toward impairing the success of the field operations of an army. If this were a proposition to regulate the trial of capital crimes in time of peace, the argument presented by Mr. Kahn would have greater force. As to a few military crimes, the death sentence is authorized in time of peace, but I have not been able to find any instance where a death sentence has been adjudged by a court-martial in time of peace. Over and above the court to act upon such a sentence is the convening authority, and over and above both the court and the convening authority stands the President of the United States, whose sanction is necessary in peace before a death sentence can be executed. I request that the committee consider very carefully the question of introducing into our military jurisprudence the principle of the civil law, which requires, in addition to these safeguards, a unanimous verdict.

Gen. Ansell's quotation is a plain misstatement of facts, and is an attempt to convey the impression that Gen. Crowder entertained opposition to surrounding an accused upon trial before general court-martial with any of the safeguards guaranteed by law to an accused in civil cases.

(G) APPELLATE PROCEDURE—GEN. ANSELL'S CHARGE THAT GEN. CROWDER ENTERTAINS AND HAS EXPRESSED ILLIBERAL VIEWS AS TO APPELLATE PROCEDURE.

Charge.—Gen. Ansell, before this committee, in discussing revision of the Military Code of 1916, charges Gen. Crowder with expressing illiberal views as to appellate procedure, to committees of Congress which considered and reported the revision of 1916. Gen. Ansell (p. 257) quotes Gen. Crowder as saying on this subject:

If there is one thing we must not have in the Military Establishment it is an appellate tribunal. (P. 257.)

Gen. Ansell further charges Gen. Crowder with the following statements:

In a military code there can be no provision for a court of appeal. Military justice and the purpose which it is expected to subserve will not permit of the vexatious delays incident to the establishment of an appellate procedure. However, we safeguard the rights of an accused, and I think we effectively safeguard them, by requiring every case to be appealed in this sense, that the commanding general convening the court, advised by the legal officer of his staff, must approve every conviction and sentence before it can become effective, and in cases where a sentence of death or dismissal has been imposed there must be, in addition, the confirmation of the President. (P. 257.)

Answer.—A careful examination of the hearings before the committees of Congress which considered the revision of 1916 has been made. The following is the only comment by Gen. Crowder found in the hearings, on the subject of appellate jurisdiction:

I might interject here the remark that the administration of military justice differs from that of civil justice in that every case is appealed. There is always somebody above the trial court authorized to act by way of disapproval (p. 27, 1912 hearings).

Over and above the court to act upon * * * a sentence is the convening authority and over and above the court and the convening authority stands the President of the United States, whose sanction is necessary in peace before a death sentence can be executed. (P. 48 Id.)

A soldier is tried for an offense, the court convicts him, and the proceedings come to headquarters for approval. They are subjected to review by the commanding general. * * * The commanding general and his legal adviser think the proof not sufficient * * *. (P. 50 Id.)

(This statement was made in discussion of reviewing officers' power to approve as to a lesser included offense.)

The statement quoted by Gen. Ansell and the statements which he charges Gen. Crowder with making are not found in the hearings. The statements which Gen. Ansell charges that Gen. Crowder made on this subject are much broader than the actual language of Gen. Crowder, and would indicate opposition by Gen. Crowder to appellate procedure; which is not warranted by Gen. Crowder's testimony on the subject.

(H) GEN. ANSELL'S CHARGE THAT GEN. CROWDER ENTERTAINS AND HAS EXPRESSED ILLIBERAL VIEWS AS TO ACCUSED'S RIGHT OF CHALLENGE.

Charge.—Gen. Ansell, on page 256 of the hearings, in charging Gen. Crowder with the expression of illiberal views before committees of Congress in hearings on the revision of 1916, quotes Gen. Crowder as follows, in respect of peremptory challenges:

I think it would be very harmful, indeed, for this committee to undertake to modify these Articles of War by injecting into them any of these civil protections.

Answer.—The hearings on this subject disclose Gen. Crowder's actual language to have been—

It would be an innovation, and I think an unwise one. (P. 31, 1912 hearings.)

The right of peremptory challenge which is common to our civil courts has never had a place in our military jurisprudence, * * * and I am inclined to think that its introduction would be fraught with grave consequences. (P. 32, Id.)

Gen. Ansell's exact quotation is not found in the hearings. It is not justified by what Gen. Crowder said on this subject. It conveys the impression that Gen. Crowder held opposition to permitting in trials by court-martial any of the safeguards accorded accused in civil courts. This is not justified by Gen. Crowder's language.

III.—ATTACKS UPON THE PRESENT SYSTEM OF ADMINISTERING MILITARY JUSTICE, AND UPON THE ARTICLES OF WAR, AND THE REVISION OF 1916.

(A) ALLEGED ARCHAISM OF THE ARTICLES OF WAR.

Charge.—Gen. Ansell charges in his testimony on the pending bill, S. 64, before this subcommittee, that our system is "a vicious anachronism" (pp. 102, 223, 229–230, 241), "medieval" (p. 230), "thoroughly archaic" (p. 102), "a witless adoption" of the British Articles of War of 1774 (p. 103).

He further says (speaking of the alleged archaism of the present military code):

The Judge Advocate General in an address in the city of Chicago, reported in the press, which he has frequently referred to since, is shown as saying that all that the American Bar Association's president, Mr. Page, and Senator Chamberlain and other people who were going after this system, said, was true, except for the revision of 1916 of which he was the author. (P. 247.)

Answer.—He has reference to an address before the Chicago Bar Association January 13, 1919. I have never seen in print any allusion to the court-martial system made in the course of that address. The stenographic notes of what I said were, however, sent to me for correction, a correction, by the way, which I never made. From these notes I am able to speak positively, and they show that what I did say was this:

Now, gentlemen, I have this to say, that I do not believe that there is a criminal code of any State of the Union that has embodied so much in the way of essential reforms, that reform organizations have been discussing, as the present Military Code of the United States, under which we have fought this World War.

I was here referring to the principal reforms in civil criminal jurisprudence that had been urged by criminologists in late years, together with the extent to which they had been already incorporated in the present military system, as follows:

1. Brevity of pleading.—This is a distinguishing feature of the military system. Sections 61 and 74 of the Court-Martial Manual require the pleading to "set forth in simple and concise language facts sufficient to constitute the particular offense and in such manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended."

2. Presentment instead of indictment.—This idea is inherent in the military system.

3. Requiring the accused to testify.—This idea prevailing under European codes of the civil law has been sometimes advanced as a reform measure. It was not deemed desirable or compatible with American notions of justice and the code expressly prohibits it by the twenty-fourth article of war.

4. Abolition of the presumption of innocence.—This idea, also borrowed from the civil law, has been rejected in the military system. By section 277 of the Court-Martial Manual, the presumption of innocence is asserted as a presumption of law.

5. Giving judge greater power in summing up.—This is admitting the judge of the law to participation in the conclusion of fact. This is true of military trials.

6. Abolition of unanimity of jurors.—This is provided by the forty-third article of war, which requires a majority of the court for conviction except in death cases, when the concurrence of two-thirds is necessary.

7. Curtailling the right of appeal.—This proposition, frequently urged as a reform measure, has not been adopted in the military system where the tendency has been in the other direction.

8. Curtailling press comment.—This idea, adopted extensively in England and in some respects in a few States, lies beyond the military system altogether.

9. Indeterminate sentences and probation.—The military system has gone as far or farther than any civil jurisdiction in this direction.

10. Safeguards of mental responsibility.—Here, too, the military system has adopted advanced scientific theories and has provided by psychiatric examinations and otherwise against the conviction of the mentally irresponsible. Section 219 of the Court-Martial Manual provides for the interruption of trial and scientific examination wherever the existence of mental disease or derangement on the part of the accused is brought in issue.

My estimate of the present military system was not different from that made by the Senate Committee on Military Affairs on February 6, 1914, when they reported to the Senate upon a code substantially the same as the present, adopting the words of the subcommittee as follows:

Convinced that the revision embodies many essential reforms in our military law, and that it presents an adequate and modern military code, your subcommittee earnestly recommends that the project, as set forth in the amended draft, be recommended for enactment.

(B) SAME SUBJECT.—ALLEGED "ARCHAISM" OF THE PRESENT ARTICLES OF WAR.

1. Charge.—Gen. Ansell says:

In his statement to the Military Committee, the Judge Advocate General on May 14, 1912, said, "As our code existed it was substantially the same as the code of 1806."

The modifications that were deemed necessary were simply such modifications as were necessary to make the articles fit into the mere machinery of our Government and introduce the requisite terminology. Speaking of his so-called revision of 1916, the Judge Advocate General said:

"It is thus accurate to say that during the long interval between 1806 and 1912—106 years—our military code has undergone no change except that which has been accomplished by piecemeal amendment."

The so-called revision of 1916 was only a verbal one and not an organic revision—the proponents themselves so stated. They did not contemplate the making of a single change.

Answer.—It will thus be seen that Gen. Ansell attempts to show out of my own mouth that there were no material changes incorporated into the revision of 1916, but that that revision was merely a rearrangement of the existing Articles of War.

He fails to call attention to the fact that between 1912 and 1916, the date of final enactment, many substantial changes had been secured and that these reforms acquired piecemeal between 1912 and 1916 were supplemented by other material reforms secured in 1916 and the whole then incorporated into the Articles of War and the Code enacted as a single piece of legislation in 1916.

Between 1912 and 1916 the following acts were passed, containing legislation looking toward the reform of the system of military justice:

The act of August 22, 1912 (37 Stat., 356).

The act of March 2, 1913 (37 Stat., 721).

The act of April 24, 1914 (38 Stat., 347).

The act of April 27, 1914 (38 Stat., 354).

The act of March 4, 1915 (38 Stat., 1084).

The act of August 22, 1912 (37 Stat., 356), secured the following reforms:

1. Exempted peace-time deserters from loss of citizenship rights; and
2. Permitted reenlistment of peace-time deserters by permission of the Secretary of War.

The act of March 2, 1913 (37 Stat., 721), secured the following reforms:

1. Enlargement of power to convene general courts-martial.
2. The creation of special courts-martial.
3. Enlargement of powers of summary courts.

The act of April 24, 1914 (38 Stat., 347) secured the following reform:

1. Volunteer forces were made subject to the laws, orders, and regulations governing the Regular Army.

The act of April 27, 1914 (38 Stat., 354), secured the following reforms:

1. Providing that an enlistment period shall not be regarded as complete until the soldier has made good any time lost from service by his own misconduct.
2. Authorizing the reviewing authority to suspend the execution of a sentence of dishonorable discharge until the soldier's release from confinement.

The act of March 4, 1915 (38 Stat., 1084), secured the following reforms:

1. United States Prison, Fort Leavenworth, Kans., changed to the United States Disciplinary Barracks.

2. Providing for the confinement in penitentiaries of military offenders convicted of civil felonies alone or of military offenses in connection with civil felonies.

3. Providing that all persons not convicted of civil felonies be confined in disciplinary barracks.

4. Providing for the organization of the disciplinary battalion, looking to the restoration or reenlistment of offenders in confinement in disciplinary barracks.

5. Authorizing the Secretary of War to remit the unexecuted portion of sentences of offenders sent to the United States Disciplinary Barracks for confinement; to order their honorable restoration to duty when not discharged the service, or when discharged from service to authorize their reenlistment upon their written application when their conduct in confinement so justifies.

6. Creation of branches of the United States Disciplinary Barracks.

No effort had been made to arrange in convenient form the amendments secured between 1912 and 1916. The revision of 1916, act of August 29, 1916 (39 Stat., 650), incorporated some of these changes into the Articles of War and in addition introduced many other changes, the more important of which are as follows:

1. Giving concurrent jurisdiction to general courts-martial, military commissions, and other war tribunals in certain cases.

2. Making mandatory that accused be furnished counsel at his request.

3. The inauguration of a system of suspended sentences of fine or confinement.

4. Providing for one or more assistant trial judge advocates for each general court-martial.

5. Authorizing the President to prescribe procedure before courts-martial.

6. Reenactment of the statutes of limitation for military offenses.

7. Granting to persons in the military force the right to remove to Federal courts all suits and prosecutions brought against them in State courts for acts done under the color of their military status.

8. Authorizing reviewing and convening authorities to mitigate a finding of guilty to a finding of guilty of any lesser included offense.

9. Reenactment of the statute concerning taking of depositions.

10. Making necessary the concurrence of two-thirds of the members of the court-martial in finding an accused guilty of an offense for which the death sentence is mandatory.

11. Guaranteeing the same treatment to officers and enlisted men in procedure prior to trial.

12. Establishing in commanding officers power to administer disciplinary punishment without the intervention of a court-martial.

13. Eliminating from the only remaining article of war (A. W. 56, false muster) in which a court-martial might adjudge in time of peace loss of civil rights, the power to deprive an accused upon conviction of such rights.

14. Creation of a comprehensive probate jurisdiction within the Military Establishment.

From the foregoing it will be seen that it is not true that the revision of 1916 was simply a codification and rearrangement of the Code of 1806.

2. Charge.—Gen. Ansell says, in substance:

I say that his (Gen. Crowder's) revision (1916) did not revise and that we still have the British Code of 1774, itself of even more ancient origin—the so-called revision of 1916 was only a verbal one and not an organic revision—they (the revisers) did not contemplate the making of a single change—such revision as was made, made the structure even more firmly upon the principle that courts-martial are absolutely subject to the power of military command.

Answer. It is true that the revision of 1916 preserved the fundamental distinction between civil and military courts which the peculiar needs of each demand. What those peculiar needs are and the manner in which each must be met were discussed in my letter of March 10. I need not repeat them. But Gen. Ansell leaves the impression that theories for the administration of justice can become "modern and enlightened" only by discarding and destroying the fundamentals of systems that centuries of application have shown to be both necessary and best. He is apparently not willing to admit that a real improvement and true modern enlightenment can be obtained by slow building upon old theories that are essentially sound. He commits himself to the proposition that improvement is possible only through revolution. To the wisdom of such a theory the American people have not yet been converted, although I must admit that current events are placing the issue before them in a very disagreeable way in many phases of their social and political life.

But, as I said in my letter of March 10, the Military Criminal Code of 1916 no more deserves the term "archaic" than the Revised Statutes of the United States, under which the Federal courts since 1878 administered civil justice, and it is nearly 40 years later than the civil Revised Statutes.

But Gen. Ansell would leave the impression that I am contending that the existing code is perfect and that it is capable of few, if any, improvements. This is an impression entirely opposed to what I said in my letter of March 10. I then said that, in the light of the experience of a great war "which subjected the military code to unprecedented test," I readily could admit that certain improvements, limited in number, have been demonstrated to be worth while introducing, and I did suggest in that letter the changes which I thought the experience of the war had disclosed to be necessary.

(C) COURT OF MILITARY APPEALS—GEN. ANSELL'S STATEMENT THAT GEN. SHERMAN AND GEN. JAMES B. FRY, FORMER PROVOST MARSHAL GENERAL, ADVOCATED SUCH A COURT.

Gen. Ansell in his testimony before this subcommittee said (p. 258) that Gen. Sherman said in an address to the graduating class at West Point June 12, 1882:

I am quite willing to see a court of appeals on courts-martial established. It would settle a great many vexed questions and give a legitimate channel for subsequent operations, instead of those who make the laws being told the findings are all wrong by some fellow working up his own case on ex parte statements.

Gen. Ansell also (pp. 259-261) quotes from an article, "A Military Court of Appeals," found in Gen. Fry's book, entitled "Military Miscellanies," apparently advocating the establishment of such a court.

Answer.—(a) In quoting Gen. Fry's article, Gen. Ansell significantly—and, I think, disingenuously—omits the one sentence in Gen. Fry's article which sums up the latter's whole attitude. That sentence, on page 186 of Gen. Fry's article, is:

But it is the purpose of this paper merely to present the subject for consideration—not to advocate it.

(b) A close reading of Gen. Sherman's remarks to the 1882 graduating class at West Point shows that he was talking of some instrumentality for considering matters of clemency—like our present clemency board—rather than a technical court of appeals. Gen. Sherman's remark, quoted by Gen. Ansell, forms part of a very brief talk to the class—not much more than five minutes talk—following an address by Senator Harrison. Senator Harrison had been talking to the class on the subject of sobriety among Army officers and had spoken of "piteous appeals" of fathers and mothers for erring sons. Gen. Sherman's remarks followed somewhat along the lines of Senator Harrison's address and advocated temperance. In the course of it he threw in the language quoted by Gen. Ansell. No such thing as a technical court of appeals was under discussion. This isolated remark is no proof of a settled conviction of Gen. Sherman on that question.

(D) CONDEMNATION OF THE NINETY-SIXTH ARTICLE OF WAR, THE SO-CALLED "GENERAL ARTICLE."

Charge.—Maj. Runcie says:

That was formerly known as "the devil's article." It was the catchall for everything that nobody had thought of putting specifically among the offenses triable by a court. It makes punishment possible, therefore, for any action which, though not involving any real offense, a commanding officer may choose to regard as prejudicial to good order and military discipline. If he can appoint a court that will accept his view of the matter or that he can coerce into agreeing with him, he can punish a man for almost anything.

This article serves another purpose also. It is available to defeat the ends of justice as well as to perpetrate injustice. If, for instance, an officer has been guilty of acts that would properly be described as "conduct unbecoming an officer and gentleman," the penalty for which is dismissal from the service—I mean that upon conviction under such a charge the sentence of dismissal is mandatory, the court having no discretion in the matter—and if for any reason the commanding officer does not desire to expose the accused officer to the risk of dismissal, he may cause the charge against him to be brought under this ninety-sixth article for "conduct to the prejudice" (p. 37).

Answer.—Here is severe condemnation of an article of war which has been in our code and the British Code for all time and about which the Supreme Court of the United States in an early case expressed a view not at all in harmony with that expressed by Maj. Runcie. Commenting on the corresponding article of the Navy code, that court said:

And when offenses and crimes are not given in terms or by definition, the want of it may be supplied by a comprehensive enactment, such as the thirty-second article of the Rules for the Government of the Navy, which means that courts-martial have jurisdiction of such crimes as are not specified, but which have been recognized to be crimes and offenses by the usages in the Navy of all nations, and that they shall be punished according to the laws and customs of the sea. Notwithstanding the apparent indeterminateness of such a provision, it is not liable to abuse; for what those crimes are and how they are to be punished is well known by practical men in the Navy and Army, and by those who have studied the law of courts-martial, and the offenses of which the different courts-martial have cognized. (Dynes v. Hoover, 61 U. S., 65, 82.)

But a general article of this kind is not peculiar to military and naval articles alone. The criminal codes of many of the States and of the District of Columbia contain provisions similar to the ninety-sixth article of war for the punishment of offenses not specifically enumerated or described. The general article, therefore, seems to be in line with enlightened criminal codes. To illustrate, the Code of the District of Columbia contains the following in addition to provisions enumerating and defining specific offenses:

Punishment for offenses not covered by provisions of code.—Whoever shall be convicted of any criminal offense not covered by the provisions of any section of this code, or of any general law of the United States not locally inapplicable in the District of Columbia, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000 or by imprisonment for not more than five years, or both. (District of Columbia Code, sec. 910.)

As another example, the Wisconsin Statutes contain the following:

Any person who shall be convicted of any offense the punishment of which is not prescribed by any statute of this State shall be punished only by imprisonment in the county jail for not more than one year or by fine not exceeding $250. (Wisconsin Statutes, sec. 4635.)

In other words, these civil codes say that as to offenses not enumerated therein recourse may be had to the common law; and the military codes say as to offenses not enumerated you may have recourse to the common law, military; and the Supreme Court says as to this article of our military code that "it is not liable to abuse." It is a case of Maj. Runcie differing from the Supreme Court of the United States—that and nothing more.

I insert here a memorandum from Lieut. Col. Dinsmore, chief of the statistical section of the Judge Advocate General's Office, concerning the effect of the revision of 1916, upon charges laid under the "general article" (former sixty-second article of war; present ninety-sixth article).

SEPTEMBER 21, 1919.

Memorandum for Gen. Crowder.

Subject: Effect of the revision of 1916 upon charges laid under the general (old 62d) article of war.

1. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, the total number of offenses of which men were convicted by courts-martial of all classes (general, special, and summary) was 58,957. Of these 33,767, or 57 per cent of the total number, were upon charges laid under the sixty-second article of war.

2. The revision of 1916 went into effect on March 1, 1917. It is therefore necessary to divide the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, into two periods. Certain offenses were, during the first eight months of that year, charged under the sixty-second article, while, during the last one-third of the year, these same offenses were charged under various specific articles of the new code. As to these offenses I have assumed that two-thirds of the charges were laid under the old general article, and one-third under some specific article of the new code. Upon this assumption the following statement is made:

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, the total number of offenses of which men were convicted by courts-martial of all classes (general, special, and summary) was 105,946, of which about 51,000, or 48 per cent, were upon charges laid under the sixty-second article of war.

3. The records of this office do not show the specific articles of war under which offenses have been charged subsequent to June 30, 1917, nor the offenses of which men have been convicted by special and summary courts-martial. I think it may be assumed that the instruction contained in paragraph 74 (e) Manual for Courts-Martial, viz: That a charge shall be laid under a specific article, whenever possible, has been generally followed. Upon this assumption the following facts are stated:

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, the total number of offenses of which men were convicted by general courts-martial was 17,202. Of these, 13,085 were convictions of offenses which could have been charged under a specific article of war, and 4,117, or about 24 per cent of the total number were upon charges which could properly have been laid under the general (96th) article.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the total number of offenses of which men were convicted by general courts-martial was 20,933. Of these, about 15,333 were upon charges which could have been laid under a specific article, while about 5,600, or about 26 per cent of the total number were upon charges which could properly have been laid under the general (96th) article.

JOHN P. DINSMORE,
Lieutenant Colonel, Judge Advocate.

(E) GENERAL ORDERS, NO. 7, WAR DEPARTMENT, JANUARY 17, 1918, AS AFFECTING RECOMMENDATIONS OF CLEMENCY BY THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL.

Charge.—That General Orders No. 7 prevented or hindered recommendations of clemency by the Judge Advocate General.

Gen. Ansell says:

But the duties of the Judge Advocate General were so defined there, I said, that we would be limited, in the administration of military justice, to what was set out in that order, and that we would be denied the power, which I deemed to be a very necessary one, in the administration of military justice, to recommend clemency to the President of the United States in all cases. So it had been held while I was away that this order acted as a limitation to that effect, upon these reviews and studies we made since the time of the publication of General Orders, No. 7, until after I got back * * * (p. 182).

When I got back I took the bull by the horns, because it was nothing less than that, and I reversed what the Acting Judge Advocate General had in my absence very properly, as a matter of law, held to be the limitations placed upon our office to recommend clemency, and instructed the boards to review and recommend clemency in proper cases.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. To recommend to the President?

Mr. ANSELL. To the President, or to a subordinate commander. I wish to say here that when we began to recommend this clemency to these commanding generals below, it had to be done with a delicacy that does not speak well for justice. They are men of power, supported by the War Department, and they wanted no interference from a mere lawyer, and frequently we got very sharp retorts from them to the effect, "You had better mind your own business; we know what this requires."

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. They were superior in rank to the men who made the recommendations.

Mr. ANSELL. Yes. They are major generals, and at best the head of my office was only a brigadier (p. 182).

Answer.—General Orders No. 7 never hindered recommendations of clemency. The fact is that the practice of the Judge Advocate General's Office in recommending clemency was never interrupted. Recommendations for clemency in appropriate cases have always been made. Nothing was contained in General Orders No. 7 preventing or restricting that practice, nor have I ever heard until now that such an interpretation of the order was ever suggested by anyone. No such view of it was taken by Gen. Ansell. He did not raise that objection in his memorandum in opposition to General Orders, No. 7, nor did he, while acting himself on these cases, entertain such a view. As late as April 17, 1918, two months and a half after General Orders, No. 7, had been in force and just before his departure for France, I find Gen. Ansell himself returning a record to a division commander with advice that the sentence was legal, coupled with a recommendation that it be mitigated. (Case 112666, Clifton Cox, Apr. 17, 1918.) During Gen. Ansell's absence in France, the Acting Judge Advocate General was Col. James J. Mayes, who certainly recommended clemency in one case within General Orders No. 7. (Case 115198, James Cox, June 19, 1918.) Whatever instructions Gen. Ansell gave upon his return, to recommend clemency in proper cases, inaugurated no new practice in this respect. To recommend clemency it was never necessary to do violence to General Orders No. 7.

To the same effect is the testimony of Col. Clark and Col. Davis given before the Senate Military Affairs Committee in February of 1919. Col. Clark said:

Now, I may say that under General Orders No. 7, which was put in operation in January, 1918, the record came direct to the Judge Advocate General, and we built up a practice during the months of January, February, March, April, and May, while I was in that section, of not only calling attention to jurisdictional and legal defects, but also accompanying the record with a recommendation as to the place of confinement, and the quantity of punishment that should be imposed, with a view of securing some uniformity of policy in respect to the amount of punishment imposed for certain classes of offenses. I do not know what became of that practice after I left the section, but understand that there was a change (pp. 186, 187).

Col. Davis said:

I may say to you, sir, that in practically all of those cases the sentence has been scaled down on the recommendation of the Judge Advocate General to what that office thought should be the case.

Since General Orders No. 7 went into effect, there is not a man in the whole service sentenced to be dishonorably discharged and to a long term of confinement whose case has not been passed upon by the Judge Advocate General's Office, by the board of review since that has been constituted, and his case passed upon for the very purpose of determining the amount of punishment which that man should serve. He is in the disciplinary barracks at this time serving, not the punishment which the court awarded him, but the punishment which the Judge Advocate General's Office, after reviewing the case, thinks he ought to bear (p. 221).

And again, Col. Davis said, outlining the progress of a case:

Now, General Orders No. 7 requires them to suspend the execution of a sentence until it is reviewed in the office of the Judge Advocate General. The Judge Advocate General reviews that sentence and advises the commanding officer out there at Camp Meade as to the result of his review. * * *

The sentence of dishonorable discharge would be suspended by the reviewing authority and the man would be sent under that suspended sentence to the disciplinary barracks. The disciplinary barracks for Camp Meade would be Fort Jay, N. Y. He is sentenced to 10 years, and after review the Judge Advocate General's Office recommends that 9 years of the sentence of confinement be remitted. Then the man stands under a sentence of dishonorable discharge which has been suspended until he is released. In other words, Senators, the unexecuted portion of that sentence may be remitted and the man restored to duty without being dishonorably discharged, and he can be put right back in the Army (pp. 222, 223).

Col. Davis further said:

Yes, sir. I might say, that Gen. Ansell, in his letter to Congressman Burnett, says that in 1918, September, 1918, he directed his board of review to suggest to reviewing authorities the very corrective action which had been applied between November, 1917, and April, 1918. It was at that time opposed by him on the ground that it was not correct procedure according to his theory of what the law authorized (p. 225).

Col. Davis, in his testimony, was dealing with the period prior to his own relief from duty in the Military Justice Division of the office, which occurred about the middle of May, 1918 (p. 200).

The Inspector General says in his report of May 8, 1919, upon "Investigation of the controversies pertaining to the office of the Judge Advocate General:"

The provisions of General Orders No. 7 became effective on February 1, 1918. From that date until April 15, 1918, the Judge Advocate General not only recommended to reviewing authorities that corrective action be taken where illegality appeared in the proceedings, but brought to their attention, with a view to mitigation, sentences which were unduly severe. During this period all cases arising under General Orders No. 7, before final action thereon, were handled either independently by Col. Davis, Chief of the Military Justice Division, or by General Crowder upon recommendation from Col. Davis. This was partly because Col. Davis had drafted the orders, and was in sympathy with them, and also because Gen. Ansell, after publication of the orders, was plainly antagonistic.

IV. GEN. ANSELL'S INACCURATE STATEMENTS.

(A) REVIEW OF RECORDS OF TRIAL IN JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL'S OFFICE.

Charge.—Gen. Ansell said to this subcommittee, on the hearing on S. 64:

Why, Senator, we did not review. * * *. We revised officers' cases, we revised death cases, and we got little further. There was one man, not always the best man, and with all too much to do, who revised—that is looked over—the other cases (p. 134).

I say that the cases were not properly reviewed. I say that they were not all reviewed; that there were only a few of them that were reviewed, * * * (p. 159).

Answer.—The truth is to the contrary.

The truth is (1) that penitentiary sentences were reviewed during the war and still are, in precisely the same way and with the same as officers' cases and death sentences; and (2) that all other cases were and are carefully examined by at least two officers—first, sentences not carrying dishonorable discharge in the "Retained in Service Section," and disciplinary barracks sentences in the "Disciplinary Barracks Section" of the office—First, by an officer to whom each case is assigned; and, second, by the chief of the section; and in some of those cases written reviews are prepared and examined by other officers in addition. Nor is it true that the officers serving in these sections were not among the best men in the office; for example, E. H. Lewis, former assistant attorney general of the State of New York, was for a long time chief of the retained in service section, succeeded by Maj. Walter M. Krimbill, former assistant United States district attorney at Chicago. Maj. (now Lieut. Col.) J. A. Tyson, an eminent lawyer of Mississippi, at present acting as counsel to the United States Board of War Purchase Supplies, was chief of the Disciplinary Barracks Section; succeeded by Maj. Charles Harris, now president pro tempore of the Senate of the State of Kentucky, and then by Maj. Calvin Wells, another well-known Mississippi lawyer, formerly secretary of the campaign committee of Senator Harrison.

In the penitentiary section also were many of the most capable men in the office, including at various times such men as Maj. S. S. Metcalf, formerly president of the State Bar Association of Georgia, G. P. Middleton, a leading trial lawyer of Philadelphia, Maj. Junius Adams, another eminent Georgia lawyer, Maj. Junius Adams, counsel for the American Liquidation Commission in Europe, and others of similar ability and standing. Among the chiefs of the section were Maj. Henry W. Runyon, a very capable New Jersey lawyer; followed by Maj. E. F. Noble of Pittsburgh, now secretary of the American Liquidation Commission in Europe; and then by Maj. Hart Bright, one of the most prominent lawyers of Philadelphia. Ten reviews were required from this section of all penitentiary cases, which afterwards went through the hands of the board of review and of Col. B. A. Read, the chief of the Military Justice Department of the office, before reaching the head of the office for signature—in just the same way as the death and dismissal cases. Prior to November 6, 1918, penitentiary cases went through the same board of review as the death and dismissal cases. After the institution of a "second board of review" on November 6, 1918, penitentiary cases went to that board, which was composed of three of the very best and most experienced lawyers connected with the Judge Advocate-General's Department; namely, Lieut. Col. J. Sydney Sanner, who resigned his position on the bench of the Supreme Court of the State of Montana to enter this department; Lieut. Col. S. Moreland, nine years a judge of the Supreme Court of the Philippine Islands; and Lieut. Col. W. H. Kirkpatrick, a leading Pennsylvania lawyer with a wide trial experience.

(B) FORFEITURE OF CITIZENSHIP.

Charge.—Gen. Ansell says:

There are certain offenses—desertion, for instance—which carry with them incidental punishments in the way of civil disabilities. A man convicted of desertion is punished. He loses his right to citizenship and his right to hold office, etc. (p. 205).

Answer.—The truth is to the contrary.

No citizen loses his citizenship except by voluntary expatriation. What Gen. Ansell refers to is his citizenship rights and his right to hold public office. The loss of these rights as a penalty is now confined to the single offense of desertion committed in time of war. The forfeiture is not provided by the Articles of War but by special acts of Congress. (Rev. Stat., secs. 1996–1998.) The original act of March 3, 1865, provided that all persons who should desert the military or naval service in time of peace as well as in time of war or should leave the United States to avoid a draft, forfeited their rights of citizenship or to become citizens and should be forever incapable of holding any office of trust or profit under the United States or of exercising any right of citizens thereof. I was particularly active in helping to bring about a modification of this civil war statute, which was effected by the passage of the act of August 22, 1912, amending section 1998, Revised Statutes, so as to remove the penalty from desertion in time of peace.

Up to 1916 there was one other military offense punishable with the disability to hold office, namely, making or signing a false muster. The present Articles of War omit the disqualification as part of the penalty for this offense. This was done in pursuance of my recommendation to Congress as follows:

The further phrase "and shall thereby be disabled to hold any office or employment in the service of the United States," occurring in existing Articles of War 6 and 14 has been omitted * * * for the reason that punishment by way of disqualification to hold public office, both civil and military, is believed to be a particularly inappropriate one to be awarded by a military tribunal; and there is this further reason * * * that the offenses specified, though grave, are not more so than sundry other military crimes for which less severe penalties are provided. It is the effect of this revision to abolish this form of punishment—disqualification to hold office—in all cases where it is authorized in the existing code (Comparative Print, Articles of War, Gen. Crowder's note to Article 56.)

(C) CAMP GRANT RAPE CASES.

Charge.—Gen. Ansell said before this subcommittee (hearings on S. 64, p. 262):

That as a result of the first trials in May and June, 1918, 17 men were convicted.

He said further (p. 263):

All of them were convicted and they would have been hanged by this time.

Answer.—The truth is to the contrary.

(1) On the first trials in May and June, 1918, only 15 of the accused were convicted, 6 of whom were sentenced to hang and the remaining 9 were sentenced to life imprisonment; 1 accused was acquitted as insane, and 5 others were acquitted.

(2) Even if the sentences imposed by the first courts in 1918 had been executed, only 6 of the 15 convicted could have been hanged.

(D) PROPORTION OF CHARGES PREFERRED, REFERRED FOR TRIAL; CONVICTIONS; ACQUITTALS.

Charge.—In his testimony recently given before this subcommittee Gen. Ansell says:

Out of every 100 sets of charges drafted by an officer against an enlisted man, between 96 and 97 were tried (p. 199).

Answer.—The truth is these statistics relate to charges approved by the commanding officer and forwarded with his recommendation of trial; not to all charges "drafted" by any officer.

Of course, Gen. Ansell means to be understood as saying: Out of every 100 sets of charges "forwarded" and not "drafted." Many charges that are drafted and presented to a commanding officer to be forwarded for trial are dropped on the preliminary examination; or referred for trial to an inferior court. As to the number of these, no statistics are available. Amending, therefore, the statement to read "forwarded" and not "drafted," Gen. Ansell's figures are substantially correct. Examinations of the statistics for 1912, 1913, 1914, and 1915 have been made, and of the total number of sets of charges forwarded to convening authorities 96.36 per cent were ordered by those convening authorities to be tried.

SAME SUBJECT.

Charge.—Gen. Ansell, in his testimony before this subcommittee, further states:

Between 96 and 98 of every 100 charges preferred result in trial and conviction (p. 266).

Answer.—The truth is, again, the statistics relate not to all charges preferred, but only to those approved for trial, both by the commanding officer and by the convening authority. Even so, the truth is to the contrary.

Gen. Ansell undoubtedly means to say "referred" by the convening authority for trial; and not "preferred." The statistics for a single year—that of 1918—have been considered, and of those referred for trial there were acquittals in 12.01 per cent; and, of the convictions by the court, reviewing authorities disapproved an additional 5.05 per cent; so that the total resulting in acquittals, or disapproval, which is the equivalent of acquittal, was 17.06 per cent. So that the statement of Gen. Ansell that between 96 and 98 per cent of the charges preferred resulted in trial and conviction, and between 2 and 4 per cent of such charges resulted in acquittals, is erroneous.

Of course, these statistics take no account of special and summary court charges drafted, preferred, or referred for trial.

(E) STATISTICS OF COURT-MARTIAL TRIALS FOR THE YEAR PRECEDING THE ARMISTICE.

Charge.—Gen. Ansell says, in his testimony before this subcommittee:

For the year immediately preceding the armistice, according to the reports that I have, there were 28,000 general courts-martial out of an army of an average of 2,000,000. We know the size of the army the year before the armistice, and we know the size of the army at the time of the armistice, and I roughly estimate it at 2,000,000 men average.

In the inferior courts during the same period there were between 340,000 and 360,000 cases (pp. 190, 191).

I do not know how the inferior court cases were divided between special courts and summary courts; we have no way of telling that, as those records do not come to us except in unusual cases (p. 191).

Answer.—The truth is to the contrary.

(a) The number of men tried by general courts-martial from November 11, 1917, to November 11, 1918, by months, is as follows:

1917.

November (two-thirds of whole number of cases for that month).....	482
December.....	910

1918.

January	1,130
February	1,200
March	1,300
April	1,440
May	1,387
June	1,380
July	1,457
August	1,516
September	1,171
October	1,100
November (one-third of whole number of cases for that month)	440
Total	15,182

(b) During the fiscal year ending on June 30, 1918, the total number of trials by summary courts-martial in all commands was 229,839, 202,085 of which resulted in convictions and 9,732 in acquittals (some commands did not report the number of convictions and acquittals). During the same period the total number of trials by special courts-martial was 14,715, of which 13,275 resulted in convictions and 1,440 in acquittals.

Incomplete reports for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, show a total number of 200,614 trials by summary courts-martial, of which 189,270 resulted in convictions and 11,344 in acquittals; and 23,634 trials by special courts-martial, of which 20,565 resulted in convictions and 3,069 in acquittals.

(c) Taking two-thirds of the total number of trials by special and summary courts-martial during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and one-third of the total number of trials by those courts during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, it may be stated that there were, between November 11, 1917, and November 11, 1918, a total of about 218,752 trials by summary courts-martial and about 17,971 trials by special courts-martial, or a total of 236,723 trials by inferior courts.

In order to supply the figures upon trials by inferior courts during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, concerning which reports have not yet reached this office, I estimate (liberally) that a total of 35,000 cases ought to be added to the number quoted, to be divided as follows: Summary court trials, 90 per cent; special court trials, 10 per cent.

Adding these figures to those already quoted it may be stated that the total number of trials by summary and special courts-martial from November 11, 1917, to November 11, 1918, was about 271,723; as against 340,000 to 360,000, as stated by Gen. Ansell.

(d) The Judge Advocate General's published report for 1918 (p. 15) shows a segregation between special and summary court statistics.

(e) Summarizing, therefore, we have, for the year immediately preceding the armistice, about 15,182 trials by general courts-martial, as against 28,000, as stated by Gen. Ansell; and about 272,000 trials by inferior courts, as against 340,000 to 360,000, as stated by Gen. Ansell. We also find that the Judge Advocate General's published report for 1918 (p. 15) shows a segregation between special and summary court statistics.

(F) CLEMENCY BOARD.

Charge.—Gen. Ansell, in his testimony before this subcommittee, further states:

The Judge Advocate General organized this special board of clemency review, consisting of three lawyers chosen, as I say, especially because they reflected absolutely the views of the department and the Judge Advocate General. Seldom or never could that board find a case poorly tried. They were all well tried. So that every case that the clemency examiner reported as poorly tried went to this clemency board, when they would report back to the Judge Advocate General, frequently in language characterized by brusqueness and unjudicial temper. They would say, "It is absurd to say that this case was poorly tried" (p. 196).

Gen. Ansell also states:

More than 60 per cent of these cases were so badly tried that no man—no fair-minded and intelligent man—could say that the records can be relied upon to sustain any punishment (p. 119).

Answer.—According to a report prepared by Lieut. Col. J. Sydney Sanner (former justice of the Supreme Court of Montana), chairman of the special board of review referred to by Gen. Ansell, under date of June 15, 1919, the special clemency board had, on that date, considered 4,268 cases, of which 1,010 had been passed on by the special board of review. If it is true, as stated by Gen. Ansell, that "every case that the clemency examiner reported as poorly tried went to the clemency board," then Gen. Ansell's statement that "more than 60 per cent of those cases were so badly tried that * * * no fair-minded and intelligent man could say the records can be relied on to sustain any punishment," is inaccurate, since on June 15, 1919, out of 4,268 cases considered by the special clemency board, only 1,010, or about 25 per cent, had been reported by the clemency examiner as "poorly tried."

Of the 1,010 cases referred to the special board of review, that board found that 342 were fairly characterized as "poorly tried," "bad," "doubtful," or "unsatisfactory"; and that of those 342 "poorly tried" cases the characterization was justified in 206 by the admission of improper evidence; in 136 by the inertness or inadequacy of counsel for the accused; in 69 by poor preparation on the part of the prosecution; in 42 by errors of the court in rulings at the trial; and in 32 by the fact that no evidence was presented aliunde the plea of guilty.

[In other words, in approximately 143 of these cases, the characterization was justified on more than one of these grounds.]

The report also shows that, of the 4,268 cases considered by the special clemency board, a trifle under 1 per cent were bad; a trifle under 2 per cent were bad, doubtful, or unsatisfactory; a trifle under 5 per cent show formal irregularities; a trifle over 8 per cent were poorly tried.

(G) SAME SUBJECT—CLEMENCY BOARD.

Charge.—Gen. Ansell, in his testimony before this subcommittee, further states:

Some time in early March I observed that the clemency examiners, the officers who made the records, evidently did not understand the considerations that would have governed me in examining the records for purposes of clemency. They were deferring too much to the record. They were approaching it as they would review a record for determining errors of law, and were not taking into account what the record reflected of the human situation; not governed by those aspects, but simply by the legal determinations of the record * * * (p. 192).

Senator LENROOT. Do I understand by that, General, that the policy was that if they found what would have been in a civil court a reversible error they would recommend clemency, but otherwise not? (p. 192).

Mr. ANSELL. It was largely that; and they were pretty strict about the reversible-error proposition also. Yes, Senator; that probably expresses it as accurately as it could be expressed (p. 192).

Answer.—The truth is to the contrary.

The report of the special board of review referred to in the last preceding paragraph shows that of the first 4,268 cases considered by the special clemency board the question of the legal sufficiency of the record was raised by the clemency examiner in only 1,010 cases, or about 25 per cent of the entire number.

From February 25, 1919, to September 29, 1919, inclusive, 6,824 cases had been considered by clemency agencies in the office of the Judge Advocate General. Prior to the time at which these cases were considered by the special clemency board, the record of trial in each of the cases considered by that board had been examined as to its legal sufficiency by at least one officer in the office of the Judge Advocate General, and many of these records had been examined by more than one officer. Of the 6,824 cases examined by the special clemency board during the period stated, clemency in some form was recommended in 5,584 cases, or about 82 per cent of the entire number, and as a result of this examination a reduction in the average sentence has been brought about equal to about 73 per cent of the average sentence adjudged in the cases considered. This shows, not that the records of trial in these cases were legally insufficient or the sentences were generally considered to have been too severe when imposed, but merely that the return of conditions approximating those of peace has made possible an amelioration of the rigors of punishment required in time of war.

I append a statistical report by Lieut. Col. N. D. Ely, of the Judge Advocate General's office:

I.

Statistics based on clemency memoranda.

(H) SAME SUBJECT. ORGANIZATION OF THE CLEMENCY BOARD.

Large.—Speaking of the organization of the clemency boards, Ansell makes the following statements:

Crowder takes credit that the existing clemency board, upon which I am still president, was established by him upon his return to this office, as though he created the situation necessitating it (p. 222).

It must be permitted to say this: Every organ of that office (the J. A. G. O.) had to secure * * * moderation of sentences—which now he (the Judge Advocate General) calls so effectively to his aid—was instituted by me and by me.

Without any authority from or help of the Judge Advocate General I organized * * * the clemency board—and it was my effort, taken in his absence, that met the necessity for the special clemency board, which, though restricted in covert way by the department and the office of the Judge Advocate General, has done so much recently to reduce sentences. The Judge Advocate General's attitude has been one of absolute reaction. He has not approved of such organization; he has not approved of my efforts to secure correctness of court-martial judgments and restoration of them (p. 244).

Answer.—This statement of Gen. Ansell's is widely variant from facts. They are all summarized in the attached memorandum; in an appendix to the memorandum, is set forth the entire correspondence on the subject. Let the facts speak for themselves. I insert here a chronological statement concerning the organization of a special clemency board in the office of the Judge Advocate General, together with copies of original documents relating thereto.

Exhibit 4, January 17, 1919: Form of order limiting punishments for offenses committed since the armistice (published by The Adjutant General's telegram of Jan. 22, Exhibit 5, January 20, 1919: Memorandum from the Secretary of War to Gen. Crowder, approving recommendations in Exhibit 3.

Exhibit 6, January 28, 1919: Office order No. 18, J. A. G. O., signed by Gen. Crowder, organizing and appointing clemency board.

Exhibit 7: Plan for carrying out work of clemency board, suggested by board and approved by Gen. Crowder.

Exhibit 8, March 5, 1919: Memorandum assigning officers to three divisions of clemency board and announcing rules of procedure.

Prior to the creation of the clemency board on January 28, 1919, there had existed, as an integral part of the military justice division of the office of the Judge Advocate General, the clemency and restoration section. A description of the functions of the clemency section and a detailed statement of the attitude toward cases arising during the war are foreign to the subject of this memorandum, but it may properly be stated that the clemency section had not followed the policy of recommending reduction of sentences to confinement. In those cases where under all the circumstances the prisoner was deemed to have served a sufficient portion of the sentence, his release was recommended; while in other cases, clemency was not recommended, or was not recommended "at this time."

2. On January 11, 1919, Acting Judge Advocate General Ansell wrote a memorandum to the Secretary of War (Exhibit 1), commenting on eight particular cases and severely criticizing the procedure of courts-martial and reviewing authorities. He said, among other things: "I am convinced that courts-martial and approving authorities are abusing their judicial powers in awarding and approving such sentences. Such sentences are extremely harsh and cruel. * * * From every point of view they are a travesty upon justice."

He stated that in a great number of cases he had invited the attention of convening authorities to the great severity of the punishment; and concerning the eight cases commented on by him, he stated that he would call the attention of the reviewing authority to the severity of the sentences and in some of them suggest remissions or further reductions.

He concluded by saying: "Again I have to advise you that these are not, in my judgment, isolated examples, but are evidence of more general deficiencies in the administration of military justice which I have observed, at least I believe I have observed, during this war."

He made no recommendation, nor did he suggest any remedy for the conditions he characterized. (See Exhibit 1.)

3. On January 13, 1919, the Secretary of War forwarded the foregoing memorandum in a letter to Gen. Crowder (Exhibit 2), in which he said:

"It would seem entirely clear that there ought to be some general plan for reviewing and modifying sentences of the kind illustrated by him which have been imposed during the war and are characterized by severity which would not be the case in time of peace. To be sure, the offenses of which these men have been found guilty have a somewhat different color and gravity during the period of hostilities, but it goes without saying that a review of the sentences imposed during the last 20 months will disclose (1) very unequal degrees of punishment, and (2) perhaps generally a system of penalties which the ends of justice and discipline would not justify us in enforcing now that hostilities have ceased.

"I am not able to gather from Gen. Ansell's memorandum whether he recommends action by general order on my part, addressed to all commanders, and imposing further limits upon the severity of sentences. I do not know what my powers in the premises are, but if I have the power to issue such an order, it would seem that it ought to be immediately prepared and issued so as to stop now any further accumulation of cases in which clemency would be necessary to prevent a harshness and severity which you and I both agree are unnecessary from any disciplinary point of view."

4. Responding under date of January 18, 1919 (Exhibit 3), Gen. Crowder briefly discussed the matter under the two heads:

- (a) Unequal punishments of courts-martial.
- (b) System of war-time penalties no longer necessary.

After stating that the only issue is in respect of the quantum of punishment, he recommended that to meet the situation in future a general order be issued (see Draft Exhibit 4).

"To meet the past situation, I propose that this office, after classifying the sentences imposed, shall proceed under approved rules to equalize punishment through recommendations of clemency."

5. In his memorandum of January 20, 1919 (Exhibit 5), the Secretary approved both recommendations, and concerning the clemency recommendation said "I * * * will be glad to have you undertake it."

6. January 22, 1919, The Adjutant General issued by telegram the following order (being identical with Exhibit 4):

"In view of the cessation of hostilities and the reestablishment of conditions approximating those of peace both within and without the theater of war, the propriety of observing limitations upon the punishing power of courts-martial, as established by Executive order of December 15, 1916, is obvious. Where, in exceptional cases, a court-martial adjudges or a reviewing authority approves punishments in excess of the limits described in said Executive order, the reasons for so doing shall be made a matter of record. Trial by general court-martial will be ordered only where the punishment that might be imposed by a special or summary court, or by a commanding officer under the provisions of the one hundred and fourth article of war, would be under all the circumstances of the case, clearly inadequate."

hereafter the clemency board was promptly organized. See order of General of January 28, 1919 (Exhibit 6), and also (Exhibits 7 and 8).

The clemency board has considered cases upon the court-martial records and data furnished from the disciplinary barracks and the penitentiaries without regard for applications for clemency; the clemency section (first above mentioned) considered cases upon applications for clemency, applying generally the same standards for uniformity as the clemency board.

JANUARY 11, 1919.

Memorandum for the Secretary of War.

I have just finished reviewing the general court-martial cases from Camp Dix, General Order 7, which have been presented to me to-day by the Chief of the Military Justice Division of this office. Those cases relate of course to that command but I fear and have reason to believe that they evidence a situation that is more general. This condition is directly due to a failure upon the part of the court-martial—a failure which in this case appears to be absolute—to appreciate the character of their judicial functions and a similar failure upon the part of the reviewing and reviewing authority. Under the limitations of law, regulations and orders as construed in the War Department, this office was limited to advising the convening authority as to whether the record of trial was “legally sufficient to sustain findings and sentence of the court.” and was not otherwise concerned with the amount of punishment; this upon the view, of course, that the jurisdiction of the reviewing authority is final and beyond review. Nevertheless, impelled by the ample evidence found in the great number of unjust sentences passing through this office, I have presumed, with a hesitation which the delicacy of the situation demands, to invite the attention of convening authorities to the great severity of the punishment in those cases in which the punishment has appeared to be so disproportionate to the offense as to shock the conscience. In the light of what is transpiring here, and doubtless elsewhere, I do not regard that such an administrative course, in specific instances, is sufficient to achieve and establish military justice.

The cases to which I now invite your attention have all come to me to-day as a part of the day's work. The officers who have handled them in this office and I are of one mind as to what they reveal and as to the necessity for the application of curative measures. I will give you a brief summary of them.

In the case of Pvt. Sanford B. Every, Forty-ninth Company, Thirteenth Battalion, Four hundred and fifty-third Depot Brigade, the accused was convicted simply of carrying a pass in his possession unlawfully. He was sentenced to be dishonorably discharged with total forfeitures and to be confined at hard labor for 10 years. The reviewing authority reduced the confinement to three. We consider this a trivial offense, and this office will doubtless go so far as to suggest to the convening authority inasmuch as this soldier has already been in confinement about two months, that the sentence should be remitted.

In the case of Pvt. Clayton H. Cooley, Thirteenth Company, Fourth Battalion, Four hundred and fifty-third Depot Brigade, the accused was found guilty of absence without leave from July 29 to August 26, 1918, and from September 1 to September 8, failing to report for duty; escaping from confinement September 1, 1918. The court sentenced the accused to be dishonorably discharged the service, to forfeit all pay and allowances, and to be confined at hard labor for 40 years. The reviewing authority reduced the confinement to 10 years. The man has evidently been in confinement since last July. Even as so reduced, the sentence is altogether too severe, and this office, in returning the record to the convening authority, will so comment upon it.

In the case of Pvt. Charles Cino, Seventy-first Company, One hundred fifty-third Depot Brigade, the accused was tried for disobeying an order “to take his rifle out to drill,” on November 1, 1918, and on escaping from confinement on November 4. He was sentenced to be dishonorably discharged the service and confined at hard labor for 30 years, which period of confinement the reviewing authority reduced to 20. In this case, the accused claimed that he was sick, and doubtless he was suffering somewhat from venereal trouble. It may be that he was a maligner. In my judgment, the sentence, even as reduced, was entirely too severe, and this office will so comment upon it to the convening authority.

In the case of Pvt. Calvin N. Harper, Company A, Four hundred and thirteenth Depot Labor Battalion, the accused was charged with desertion and convicted of absence without leave from the 12th day of August to the 13th day of November.

He was sentenced to be dishonorably discharged, to forfeit all pay and allowances, and to be confined at hard labor for 20 years, which period of confinement the reviewing authority reduced to 10. The period of confinement even as reduced is unreasonably severe, and this office will comment upon it accordingly.

(e) In the case of Pvt. Salvatore Pastoria, Company 36, Ninth Training Battalion, One hundred and fifty-third Depot Brigade, the accused was convicted of absence without leave from the 17th day of September until the 4th day of November, 1918. The accused testified, and in the absence of Government showing to the contrary I believe, that he went home to a young wife with a sick child, who was having considerable difficulty in keeping body and soul together. This, of course, does not justify, but it does extenuate. The court sentenced the accused to be dishonorably discharged and confined at hard labor for 15 years, which, however, was reduced by the reviewing authority to 3. I think it should be still further reduced, and shall so suggest to the convening authority.

(f) In the case of Pvt. Marion Williams, Fifty-eighth Company, Fifteenth Battalion, One hundred and fifty-third Depot Brigade, the accused was found guilty of disobeying the order of his lieutenant to "give me those cigarettes," behaving in an insubordinate manner to one of his sergeants by telling him to "go to hell," and behaving himself with disrespect towards his lieutenant by saying to him that he, the accused, did not "give a God damn for anybody." Of course there can be no question but that such conduct can not be tolerated, but, after all, it is of a kind that appears far more serious in a set of charges than in actuality. It was a company rumpus, which, in my judgment, might have been otherwise dealt with or under the circumstances of its commission, merited no very long term of confinement. There was no evidence of previous misconduct. The court sentenced the accused to be dishonorably discharged from the service, to forfeit all pay and allowances due or to become due, and to be confined at hard labor for 40 years, which period of confinement the convening authority reduced to 10. This office will invite his attention to the severity of the sentence.

(g) In the case of Pvt. Lawrence W. Sims, Forty-ninth Company, Fourteenth Battalion, One hundred and fifty-third Depot Brigade, the accused was convicted of absence without leave from August 8, 1918, to November 20, 1918, and was sentenced to be dishonorably discharged and to be confined at hard labor for 25 years, which period of confinement the reviewing authority reduced to 10. Inasmuch as the record suggests that this case was something worse than absence without leave, this office does not feel justified in commenting upon it to the reviewing authority. However, the long term of imprisonment is cited to show the constitutional tendency of the court to award shockingly severe sentences.

(h) Another case has just been handed me, that of Pvt. Fred J. Muhlke, Medical Corps, Base Hospital, tried at Camp Grant for insubordinate conduct, which, at worst, could not merit confinement for more than a year or so in the disciplinary barracks. The court sentenced the accused to dishonorable discharge, total forfeiture, and confinement at hard labor for 50 years. The convening authority consumed some 10 pages in his review to show that such punishment was well merited.

3. If these were isolated examples, they could be corrected, of course, without raising any serious question. But they are not. I am convinced that courts-martial and approving authorities are abusing their judicial powers in awarding and approving such sentences. Such sentences are extremely harsh and cruel. Surely no person having an ordinary sense of human justice can intend that any substantial proportion of such sentences shall ever be served. If they are awarded to be served they will bring disgrace by their shocking cruelty; if they are awarded as a sort of "bluff" they will bring sacred functions into disrepute both in and out of the Army. From every point of view they are a travesty upon justice.

4. If the courts are blameworthy, the convening and reviewing authorities are no less so. They do not instruct their courts; they approve of such sentences and permit them to stand; they abuse their powers, and decline to apply their judgment and discretion to justice, by referring cases to courts-martial under arbitrary blanket rules and without individualization. I have just been furnished with an example of this, found in a camp order which provides as follows:

"Absence-without-leave cases in which the offender has been absent more than 24 hours will be submitted to a special court. Cases of more than five days' absence will be submitted to a general court."

"In each instance where a case of absence without leave is referred to a court of superior jurisdiction the court must realize that it has been referred to such court because it is considered that an inferior court, with limited powers of punishment, can not handle the case with sufficient severity."

I have known of no more flagrant abuse of judicial power than this—and I beg to remind you that such power is judicial. Please see Runkel v. United States (122 U. S., 543) and Grafton v. United States (206 U. S., 333). There are numerous other decisions to this effect. (The Army—I believe I may be permitted to say the War Department also—fails to distinguish between functions which are judicial and functions which are purely administrative.)

This order contains, in effect, and was intended to convey the following directions:

(a) All absences without leave will be tried by courts-martial.

(b) Those for more than one and less than five days will be punished by six months' confinement and six months' forfeiture of pay. (The limit of punishing power of a special court.)

(c) Those for more than five days will be tried by a general court and will be punished by dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and from six months' confinement up.

5. Again I have to advise you that these are not, in my judgment, isolated examples but are evidence of more general deficiencies in the administration of military justice which I have observed, at least I believed I have observed, during this war.

(Signed by Gen. Ansell.)

JANUARY 13, 1919.

MY DEAR GEN. CROWDER: I inclose herewith memorandum submitted to me by Gen. Ansell. It would seem entirely clear that there ought to be some general plan for reviewing and modifying sentences of the kind illustrated by him which have been imposed during the war and are characterized by severity which would not be the case in time of peace. To be sure, the offenses of which these men have been found guilty have a somewhat different color and gravity during the period of hostilities, but it goes without saying that a review of the sentences imposed during the last 20 months will disclose first, very unequal degrees of punishment, and second, perhaps generally a system of penalties which the ends of justice and discipline would not justify us in enforcing now that hostilities have ceased.

I am not able to gather from Gen. Ansell's memorandum whether he recommends action by general order on my part, addressed to all commanders and imposing further limits upon the severity of sentences. I do not know what my powers in the premises are, but if I have the power to issue such an order, it would seem that it ought to be immediately prepared and issued so as to stop now any further accumulation of case in which clemency would be necessary to prevent a harshness and severity which you and I both agree are unnecessary from any disciplinary point of view.

Memorandum for the Secretary of War:

1. I have read over very carefully the brief of Gen. Ansell and your submission of it, inviting my attention to—

(a) Unequal punishments of courts-martial.

(b) System of war-time penalties which has grown up and which the ends of discipline and justice do not justify us in enforcing, now that hostilities have ceased.

2. In all the cases you have in mind the records have been reviewed in either this office or the branch office in France and found legally sufficient to sustain both the findings and the sentence, so that no issue arises in respect of any of them except the quantum of punishment.

3. To meet the situation in the future, I recommend that the following general order be cabled to all our commanding officers:

“(1) In view of the cessation of hostilities and the reestablishment of conditions approximating those of peace both within and without the theater of war, the propriety of observing limitations upon the punishing power of courts-martial, as established by Executive order of December 16, 1916, is obvious. Where in exceptional cases, a court-martial adjudges and a reviewing authority approves punishments in excess of the limits described in said Executive order, the reasons for so doing will be made a matter of record.

"(2) Trial by general court-martial will be ordered only where the punishment that might be imposed by a special or summary court, or by a commanding officer under the provisions of the one hundred and fourth article of war would be, under all the circumstances of the case, clearly inadequate."

4. To meet the past situation, I propose that this office, after classifying the sentences imposed, shall proceed under approved rules to equalize punishment through recommendations of clemency.

Memorandum for Gen. Crowder:

I have read your memorandum of January 18 with regard to unequal punishments by courts-martial.

Paragraph 4 proposes the institution of a system of review for the purpose of equalizing punishment through recommendations for clemency. I approve this recommendation and will be glad to have you undertake it.

The recommendation of paragraph 3 I have also approved, and directed that instructions as suggested be transmitted to the commanding officers.

EXHIBIT 6.

OFFICE ORDER)
No. 18. }

JANUARY 28, 1919.

Under date of January 13, 1919, the Secretary of War, in returning a memorandum submitted to him by the Acting Judge Advocate General of the Army, remarked as follows:

"It would seem entirely clear that there ought to be some general plan for reviewing and modifying sentences of the kind illustrated by him, which have been imposed during the war and are characterized by severity which would not be the case in time of peace. To be sure, the offenses of which these men have been found guilty have a somewhat different color and gravity during the period of hostilities, but it goes without saying that a review of the sentences imposed during the last 20 months will disclose, first, very unequal degrees of punishment, and, second, perhaps generally a system of penalties which the ends of justice and discipline would not justify us in enforcing now that hostilities have ceased."

In response to this memorandum the undersigned proposed, as a means of preventing any further accumulation of cases in which clemency would be necessary to prevent harshness and severity, which are unnecessary from the point of view of present disciplinary requirements, the issue of the following order:

"(1) In view of the cessation of hostilities and the reestablishment of conditions approximating those of peace, both within and without the theater of war, the propriety of observing limitations upon the punishing power of courts-martial, as established by Executive order of December 15, 1916, is obvious. Where, in exceptional cases, a court-martial adjudges and a reviewing authority approves punishments in excess of the limits described in said Executive order, the reasons for so doing will be made a matter of record.

"(2) Trial by general court-martial will be ordered only where the punishment that might be imposed by a special or summary court, or by a commanding officer under the provisions of the one hundred and fourth article of war, would be, under all the circumstances of the case, clearly inadequate."

This order was approved and has been promulgated. To meet the past situation, the undersigned proposed that the Judge Advocate General's Office should classify sentences imposed and proceed, under approved rules, to equalize punishment through recommendation to clemency, which was approved by the Secretary of War.

In order to comply with the directions of the Secretary of War for a review of sentences imposed for offenses committed during the war period, with a view not only to equalizing punishment, but to adjust that punishment to present disciplinary requirements, a board to consist of (1) Brig. Gen. Samuel T. Ansell, Judge Advocate General's Department, (2) Col. John H. Wigmore, judge advocate, (3) Maj. Stevens Heckscher, judge advocate, is appointed to undertake the work outlined by the Secretary of War and the submission of recommendations for clemency in order to accomplish the equalization of punishments and the adjustment of penalties to the present disciplinary requirements desired by him. The board will meet at the earliest practicable date and submit for approval a plan of procedure looking to a speedy prosecution and completion of the duty imposed.

E. H. CROWDER,
Judge Advocate General.

EXHIBIT 7.

PLAN FOR CARRYING OUT WORK BY CLEMENCY BOARD APPOINTED UNDER OFFICE ORDER OF JANUARY 28, 1919.

1. In all cases of general prisoners the records of general courts-martial for offenses committed since the beginning of the war, excepting the cases to be reported upon in accordance with this plan by the commandants of the disciplinary barracks and its branches, will be examined in the first instance by a force of clerks and examining officers in the office of the Judge Advocate General, and the form hereto attached will be filled out in triplicate for each case by the clerk in charge, except items 27 and 41; item 27 will be filled in by the officer examining the record and item 41 by the board.

2. The several commandants of the United States disciplinary barracks and its branches at Fort Leavenworth, Alcatraz, and Fort Jay will make a report at the earliest practicable moment to the Judge Advocate General of the Army in the case of every prisoner confined under his charge for the conviction of an offense committed since the beginning of the war, which report will be upon said form hereto attached, which will be filled out in triplicate in each case except as to items 27 and 41; item 27 will be filled in by the examining officer in the office of the Judge Advocate General and item 41 by the board.

3. When the form in any case shall have been completed in the office of the Judge Advocate General, except for item 41, it, in triplicate, together with the court-martial record in the case, will be immediately transmitted to the clerk assigned to service with the board and by him placed before the board. The clemency board will thereupon make its study of the case, enter its recommendation on the form under item 41, and place the form before the Judge Advocate General for a signature or other action, and for transmission to the Secretary of War. In case the board is not unanimous, any disagreeing member may file a briefly expressed nonconcurring recommendation.

4. As soon as the clemency board has been provided with the necessary assistance, it shall proceed to give consideration to the cases of the prisoners confined in the penitentiaries, and also to the cases transmitted to the office by the commandants of the disciplinary barracks and its branches, as nearly as possible in the order in which they are received. It is understood that said commandants will give precedence of consideration to cases as the cases may, in their judgment, merit it. It is believed, however, and so recommended, that said commandants should consider and transmit to this office cases in the following order of precedence:

(a) Those in which, because of the present information of the commandant, he believes should be immediately released.

(b) Cases of desertion in which the prisoners surrendered.

(c) Cases in which the offenses were committed within the first four months of the prisoners' first service in the Army of the United States.

5. It is believed that consideration of the cases of prisoners serving confinement outside of the United States must be deferred until after the examination of the cases of those serving sentences of confinement within the United States, since it is thought that the obtaining of the necessary information and the relationship of the offense to the theater of war are considerations which would concur in such postponement.

6. The personnel to assist the clemency board in this work must consist of the outset of not less than 7 officers and 10 clerks. It is not at all certain that this number of officers and clerks will be found to be sufficient. The importance of this task is such, and so much depends upon its expeditious performance, that an inadequate commissioned clerical personnel is bound to embarrass, if not render abortive, the entire undertaking.

MARCH 5, 1919.

Memorandum for the clemency board:

1. Col. Wigmore and Maj. Heckscher have been relieved from the board and Col. Easby-Smith, Maj. Ashton, Maj. Rogers, and Lieut. Tittmann detailed to it.

2. The board will be divided into three divisions. The first division will consist of Col. Easby-Smith and Maj. Ashton; the second division, of Maj. Connor and Maj. Rogers; the third division, of Lieut. Col. Kraemer and Lieut. Tittmann. The president of the board will be an ex officio member of each division, and will sit with it whenever requested by either member of the division whenever there are disagreeing views in the division, and whenever on other occasions he deems it advisable to sit with it.

3. When the two members of a division concur upon a recommendation, it will be entered as a recommendation of the board. Nonconcurrences will be specially reported to the president of the board, and all recommendations will be presented to the president of the board for his consideration before presentation to the Judge Advocate General.

4. Maj. Connor will be in charge of the instruction of the working force.

S. T. ANSELL.

(I) EFFECTS OF CONVICTION BY COURT-MARTIAL.

Charge.—Gen. Ansell says that men convicted by courts-martial become "military pariahs"; and adds:

Of course, you have got some suggestion of that in the Articles of War themselves. At least one article forbids any association with convicted men. (P. 198.)

Answer.—The truth is to the contrary.

The article referred to, the forty-fourth article of war, is the single instance of prohibition of such association and applies only when an officer is dismissed from the service for cowardice or fraud and his crime and punishment have been published in the newspapers as provided by law. After such publication "it shall be scandalous for an officer to associate with him." (Article of War 44.)

(J) INVESTIGATION OF GEN. ANSELL'S ACCUSATIONS BY THE INSPECTOR GENERAL.

Charge.—Gen. Ansell says:

And then the Inspector General, in my judgment, forgetting whatever quasi judicial character belongs to his position—and there ought to be a great deal of it—said, "You know, I am making a report on this subject by order of the Secretary of War. This thing is in Congress, and my report will go to Congress, and, Ansell, when it goes to Congress it will be very detrimental to you." And I said, "Well, General, I would rather meet you in Congress than deal with you here." (P. 209.)

Answer.—The truth is to the contrary.

This committee is in possession of a letter from the Inspector General denying that this conversation or any such conversation ever took place.

V. APPELLATE POWER: VARIOUS IDEAS SUBMITTED TO CONGRESS.

The following projects for conferring appellate power are before this committee:

(A) OPINION OF ATTORNEY GENERAL WIRT, SEPTEMBER 14, 1818.

By the Constitution, the President is made Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States. But, in a Government limited like ours, it would not be safe to draw from this provision inferential powers, by a forced analogy to other governments differently constituted. Let us draw from it, therefore, no other inference than that, under the Constitution, the President is the national and proper depository of the final appellate power, in all judicial matters touching the police of the Army; but let us not claim this power for him, unless it has been communicated to him by some specific grant from Congress, the fountain of all law under the Constitution. (Op. Atty. Gen. William Wirt, Sept. 14, 1818.)

(B) S. 3692 AND H. R. 9164, JANUARY, 1918.

SEC. 1199. The Judge Advocate General shall * * * report thereon to the President, who shall have power to disapprove, vacate, or set aside any finding, in whole or in part, to modify, vacate, or set aside any sentence, in whole or in part, and to direct the execution of such part only of any sentence as has not been vacated or set aside. The President may suspend the execution of sentences in such classes of cases as may be designated by him until acted upon as herein provided and may return any record through the reviewing authority to the court for reconsideration or correction.

(C) PROPOSED JOINT RESOLUTION PREPARED FOR SENATOR McKELLAR, FEBRUARY 20, 1919.

* * * That the President be, and is hereby authorized, wherever the substantial justice of the case so requires, to correct, change, reverse, or set aside any sentence of a court-martial found by him to have been erroneously adjudged whether by error of law or of fact, and for that purpose to remove any record of dishonorable discharge and to make any other order appropriate in the premises, and for that purpose also to direct the submission of any or all records of court-martial judgments to the Judge Advocate General of the Army for his opinion and recommendation.

(D) GEN. CROWDER'S RECOMMENDATION IN HIS LETTER OF MARCH 10, 1919, TO THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

Adopt either the amendment to Revised Statutes 1199, proposed by the Secretary of War January 19, 1918, which covers the ground more completely and more flexibly than the now pending bills, and also leaves the final power of ultimate decision in the President as Commander in Chief of the Army; or else adopt the plan embodied in the proposed joint resolution sent to Senator McKellar February 20, 1919, which allows the President to "correct, change, reverse, or set aside any sentence of a court-martial found by him to have been erroneously adjudged whether by error of law or of fact."

This would supply the needed appellate jurisdiction over court-martial sentences, lacking under existing law, and would place it in the Commander in Chief of the Army, who would normally act on the recommendation of his constituted legal adviser in military matters—the Judge Advocate General (p. 64).

(E) KERNAN BOARD REPORT, JULY 17, 1919.

Art. 504. * * * the Judge Advocate General of the Army, who shall receive, cause to be recorded, examine and revise * * *. When such examination or revision discloses error or other cause requiring action by the President under the provisions of these articles the Judge Advocate General shall prepare a memorandum of his views and recommendations in relation thereto and submit it with the record of the case to the Secretary of War for the action of the President.

The President, as Commander in Chief, in any case tried by a general court-martial or military commission, may set aside, disapprove, or vacate any finding of guilty in whole or in part, or modify, vacate, or set aside any sentence in whole or in part, and direct the execution of the sentence as modified, and of such part thereof as has not been vacated or set aside. The President, as Commander in Chief, may set aside the entire proceedings in any case and, subject to the provision of this article, grant a new trial before such general court, military commission or special court as he may designate; or he may restore the accused to all rights as if no such trial had ever been held, and his necessary orders to this end shall be binding upon all departments and officers of the Government.

(F) S. 5320 (CHAMBERLAIN, JANUARY, 1919), H. R. 14883 (SIEGEL, JAN. 22, 1919), H. R. 15945 (JOHNSON, FEBRUARY, 1919), AND H. R. 431 (SIEGEL, MAY 19, 1919).

SEC. 1199. The Judge Advocate General shall receive, revise, and cause to be recorded the proceedings of all courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and military commissions, * * *. The power to revise the proceedings of courts-martial conferred upon the Judge Advocate General by this section shall be exercised only for the correction of errors of law which have injuriously affected the substantial rights of an accused, and shall include—

(a) Power to disapprove a finding of guilty and to approve only so much of a finding of guilty of a particular offense as involves a finding of guilty of a lesser included offense when the record requires such finding;

(b) Power to disapprove the whole or any part of a sentence;

(c) Power, upon the disapproval of the whole of a sentence, to advise the proper convening or confirming authority of the further proceedings that may and should be had, if any. If upon revision, under this section, all the findings and the sentence be disapproved because of error of law in the proceedings, the convening or confirming authority may lawfully order a new trial by another court-martial.

Sentences involving death, dismissal, or dishonorable discharge from the service shall not be executed pending revision. If in any case a sentence though valid shall appear upon revision to be unduly severe, the Judge Advocate General shall make a report and recommendation for clemency, with the reasons therefor, to the President or the military authority having power to remit or mitigate the punishment.

(G) S. J. RES. 18 (SENATOR M'KELLAR, MAY 20, 1919).

That the President be, and is hereby, authorized and requested to constitute appoint, and convene in the Judge Advocate General's Department as many reviewing boards, composed of five commissioned officers each, as he may deem necessary to do the work speedily, the duties of which boards shall be to reexamine and review the records of conviction in every court-martial or retirement case arising during the present war and since the Mexican disturbance prior thereto, except such case wherein convictions have already been set aside and fines and penalties remitted or returned to the soldier. The said records shall be assembled by and be under the direction of the Judge Advocate General and distributed to said boards in such manner as he may deem best, and said boards shall examine into all questions both of law and of facts, and in addition they shall examine any new or additional facts which any defendant may bring before them by way of affidavits, to the end that said reviewing boards may hear and determine each case anew on the law and the facts of the record, together with such additional facts as may be adduced, and decide the cases as speedily as possible, according to the equity and justice thereof. In reaching their conclusions, the boards shall take into consideration the punishment already inflicted in each and every case, but they shall not consider the findings and judgments of the courts-martial or retirement boards as binding upon them, inasmuch as the war is over and it may not now be necessary to continue many punishments which were absolutely necessary to be inflicted in order to preserve proper military discipline during a state of war; and it shall be their duty, whenever the justice of the case may require it, to change, reverse, alter, mitigate, set aside, annul, or confirm the findings of any court-martial or retirement board convened during the present war or since the Mexican disturbance prior thereto. Such boards shall have the power and it shall be their duty in proper cases to set aside and held for naught orders of dishonorable discharges inflicted as punishment in courts-martial or retirement cases, and to enter orders granting honorable discharges or retirements, which orders shall be filed of record in the proper department containing the record of such discharged soldiers. Each board shall act by majority vote, and each board shall select its own chairman without regard to the rank of the officer. In the selection of such boards no officer shall be appointed thereon who has taken part in any court-martial or retirement trial or who has reviewed any record arising since the beginning of the present war or since the Mexican disturbance prior thereto. * * * When an opinion shall be reached, the same shall be immediately forwarded to the President by the Judge Advocate General, with the recommendation of such board. If the President approves the finding of the board, the same shall be final; but he is further authorized and empowered to enter any order or judgment in any case, whether of mitigation or annulment, in whole or in part, of any court-martial proceeding or finding or of any finding of such boards, or he pay parole or pardon, to the end that even and exact justice shall be done in each case.

(H) S. 64 AND H. R. 367 (ANSELL BILL, MAY, 1919).

Art. 52. Revision by court of military appeals.—* * * shall review the record of the proceedings of every general court or military commission which carries a sentence involving death, dismissal, or dishonorable discharge or confinement for a period of more than six months, for the correction of errors of law evidenced by the record and injuriously affecting the substantial rights of an accused without regard to whether such errors were made the subject of objection or exception at the trial; and such power of review shall include the power—

(a) To disapprove a finding of guilty and approve only so much of a finding of guilty of a particular offense as involves a finding of guilty of a lesser included offense.

(b) To disapprove the whole or any part of a sentence.

(c) To advise the proper convening or confirming authority of the further proceedings that may and should be had, if any, upon the disapproval of the whole of a sentence; and in any case in which all the findings and the sentence are disapproved because of such error of law in the proceedings the appointing authority may lawfully order a new trial by another court.

(d) To make a report to the Secretary of War for transmission to the President, recommending clemency in any case in which the sentence, though valid, shall appear to the court to be unjust or unduly severe. * * * And said court of military appeals shall have like jurisdiction to review and revise any sentence of death, dismissal, or dishonorable discharge approved for any offense committed and tried since the 6th day of April, 1917, and any sentence of death, dismissal, or discharge in the case of any person now serving confinement as a result of such sentence, upon application to that end made by the accused within six months after the passage of this act: Provided, That no case in which the sentence has heretofore been approved shall be tried again: And provided further, That the revision or reversal of the sentence in any such case shall not be effective to retain in the military service any person who has been dismissed or discharged therefrom in execution of such sentence thus reviewed, or to entitle any person to any pay or allowances, but shall be limited in its effect to the final determination that the separation from the service was honorable instead of dishonorable.

(I) H. R. 9156 (SEPT. 9, 1919, DALLINGER BILL).

Art. 6. Supreme court of military justice.—* * * shall hear and decide all cases which may be submitted to it on appeal from any military court of appeal, and its decision shall be final. It shall have the power—

(1) To disapprove a finding of "guilty" and to make a finding of "not guilty";

(2) To disapprove a finding of guilty and approve only so much of a finding of guilty of a particular offense as involves a finding of guilty of a lesser included offense;

(3) To disapprove the whole or any part of a sentence and to impose such sentence as it may deem just; and

(4) To order a new trial before a regimental court or before a court of military appeal. * * * shall have jurisdiction to review and revise any sentence of death, dismissal, or dishonorable discharge approved for any offense committed and tried since the 6th day of April, 1917, and any sentence of death, dismissal, or discharge in the case of any person now serving confinement as a result of such sentence, upon application to that end made by the accused within six months after the passage of this act: Provided, That no case in which the sentence has heretofore been approved shall be tried again: And provided further, That the revision or reversal of the sentence in any such case shall not be effective to retain in the military service any person who has been dismissed or discharged therefrom in execution of such sentence thus reviewed, or to entitle any person to any pay or allowances, but shall be limited in its effect to the final determination that the separation from the service was honorable instead of dishonorable.

VI. TABULAR STATEMENT OF THE ORGANIZATION OF BRITISH AND FRENCH MILITARY TRIBUNALS.

(Memorandum by Lieut. Col. William C. Rigby, Judge Advocate.)

(A) ORGANIZATION OF BRITISH COURTS.

1. General courts-martial:

Nine or more members, all officers; in practice usually 9 or 11; commissioned at least 3 years.

Judge advocate (impartial legal adviser), prosecutor and counsel for accused. Judge advocate advises but does not govern the court.

NOTE.—“(F) Upon any point of law or procedure which arises upon the trial which he attends, the court should be guided by his opinion, and not overrule it, except for very weighty reasons. The court are responsible for the legality of their decisions, but they must consider the grave consequences which may result from their disregard of the advice of the judge advocate on any legal point. The court, in following the opinion of the judge advocate on a legal point, may record that they have decided in consequence of that opinion.” (Rules of Procedure, par. 103 (F).)

Record forwarded (within the United Kingdom) by commanding general to J. A. G. without action, but with his recommendations.

Stenographic transcript taken; record very much like American G. C. M.

Practically officers' court within United Kingdom. Seldom used for enlisted men except in war time in serious cases where death or penal servitude is contemplated, which the district C. M. can not award. In peace time all civil crimes habitually turned over to civilian courts for trial. Only 12 G. C. M.'s held within the United Kingdom during the 9 years, 1905–1913 (1½ G. C. M.'s per annum).

“Members under instruction” usually appointed. They take no part in the proceedings but sit with the court both in open and closed sessions for the purpose merely of learning the procedure.

“Waiting members.” Two or three “waiting members” usually appointed as alternates to act in case of absence or disqualification of regular members. “Waiting members” are excused as soon as the court is sworn.

At least five judges must be of rank not below captain; the president must not be under field rank (unless in emergency).

Death sentence requires two-thirds vote.

2. District court-martial:

Three or more officers (in practice usually three, sometimes five).

May award confinement and forfeiture of pay up to two years.

Is the ordinary court for trying enlisted men within the United Kingdom. (Average D. C. M. trials, 1904–1913, inclusive, ran about 3,800 per annum with an average army stationed within the United Kingdom of about 125,000 men, about one-half of the total standing British Army, the other half being engaged in service overseas.)

Not usually attended by a judge advocate (convening authority may appoint judge advocate, but rarely does). Prosecutor is usually an officer from accused's regiment—often the battalion adjutant.

Accused does not usually have counsel, though it is permitted.

No stenographic record.

Since institution of "court-martial officers" under War Office instructions of September, 1916, president is often a court-martial officer (that is, an officer with legal training corresponding roughly to an officer of our J. A. G. D.), but this is not required.

Findings and sentence are approved by the authority appointing the court (usually a brigade or territorial commander). After confirmation the record is sent for review to the J. A. G.

D. C. M. is rarely used outside of the United Kingdom (replaced by field G. C. M. on active service).

May not try officers nor award death nor penal servitude.

Judges must have been commissioned two years.

3. Regimental court-martial:

Not less than three officers of the regiment, appointed by the regimental commander.

Proceedings confirmed by regimental commander.

Limit of punishment 42 days' detention.

May not award imprisonment, discharge with ignominy, penal servitude, nor death; nor try an officer.

Each member commissioned at least one year. President not under the rank of captain (unless in emergency).

R. C. M. almost obsolete since extension in 1910 of power of commanding officers to award up to 28 days' detention without court-martial (Army act, sec. 46).

4. Field general court-martial.

The court habitually used on active service outside of the United Kingdom.

Jurisdiction over both officers and men, all offenses.

May award death, penal servitude, imprisonment, detention, field punishment, forfeiture of pay, restriction to limits, etc. Full jurisdiction of a G. C. M.

Normally consists of at least three officers. No requirement as to length of commission.

May consist of but two officers, but in such case may not award death or penal servitude.

No stenographic record; rules of procedure are not binding, but the spirit of the rules to be applied so far as practicable.

Is intended to have a summary procedure adapted to the requirements of active service.

Death sentence requires unanimous vote. Sentence is confirmed by commanding general appointing the court; but sentence of death or penal servitude requires confirmation of the commander in chief of the force (e. g., expeditionary force in France, forces in Palestine, in Mesopotamia, etc.).

In practice reviewed by the deputy judge advocate general before confirmation by the commander in chief; after confirmation, forwarded to the judge advocate general for review (but death sentences carried into execution upon confirmation by the commander in chief; records of such death sentences not afterward reviewed by judge advocate general, but merely filed in his office).

"Court-martial officer" (analogous to officer of our J. A. G. D.) appointed as additional member of F. G. C. M., sits only in the trial of such cases as the convening authority directs as being "difficult, complicated, or serious"; usually cases where death or penal servitude likely to be awarded or where the offense is a civil crime.

5. Judge advocate general:

Reviews:

(a) Before confirmation, general courts-martial within United Kingdom.

(b) After confirmation—

1. District courts-martial wherever held.

2. Field general courts-martial wherever held.

3. General courts-martial held outside United Kingdom.

NOTE.—Jurisdiction extends throughout the British Empire, except India, for which there is a separate judge advocate general. Acts also for the air forces under the ministry of air (at present Hon. Winston Churchill is minister for air, as well as secretary of state for war).

Civilian; permanent appointment; retires at 65 years of age; salary, £2,000 per annum.

Functions advisory only; reports to secretary of state for war through deputy adjutant general (army council).

Records and judge advocate general's recommendations are in fact carefully examined by the deputy adjutant general (at present Maj. Gen. Sir B. E. W. Childs, K. C. M. G., C. B.), who, though he usually agrees with the judge advocate general, feels under no obligation to do so, and is not bound in any way by judge advocate general's opinion. If he disagrees, they consult; if they still disagree, refer to attorney general. If, after conference, attorney general differs from judge advocate general, goes to secretary of state for war for decision, with understanding that he will rather be guided by attorney general's advice than by judge advocate general, because attorney general is adviser to whole Government, whereas judge advocate general is adviser only to war department.

After confirmation, sovereign (that is, in effect, the secretary of state for war) has power to "quash"; judge advocate general, therefore, may recommend "quashal." Statistics show a trifle over 1 per cent of all cases coming through judge advocate general's office during the war were so quashed after confirmation.

Petitions are also received at any time after conviction on behalf of the accused. The record is then reexamined and the conviction sometimes quashed—practically an appeal.

NOTE.—Power to quash and to entertain such petitions is analogous to appellate power sought by proposed amendment to Revised Statutes 1199, in January, 1918.

6. "Military courts":

Try prisoners of war and civilians; analogous to our military commissions.

(B) ORGANIZATION OF FRENCH COURTS.

1. Conseil de Guerre in the territorial armies:

Permanent court organized in each military territorial district.

Seven judges appointed by commanding general by roster for six months—

(a) For the trial of an officer—all officers.

(b) For trial of an enlisted man, one noncommissioned officer on the court (usually "adjutant," corresponding to our regimental or battalion sergeant major).

Commissaire du Gouvernement prosecutor and legal adviser to the court; appointed by minister of war; an officer not under the rank of captain, 25 years of age. Not required to be a lawyer. (In practice may or may not be a lawyer. In Paris, this spring, exactly 50 per cent were lawyers—six courts sitting, three commissaires officers who were lawyers, and the other three officers without legal training.)

If accused has no counsel, court appoints counsel. May be officer, soldier, or civilian. The court has power to appoint civilian counsel, who must then serve without compensation (like counsel appointed by civilian judge to defend accused in criminal cases).

The president questions accused and other witnesses. No record of testimony kept. Statements taken before investigating officer (rapporteur), read as evidence. Witnesses usually called, but not strictly necessary.

Rapporteur (investigating officer) appointed for each court by minister of war. Army officer, not under captain, 25 years age; no other requirements; not required to be a lawyer. In practice may or may not be a lawyer. Endeavor made during the war to secure officers with legal training, but not always possible to do so.

2. Conseil de Guerre in armies on active service (or in a "state of siege"):

Five judges appointed by commanding general, to serve at his pleasure.

For trial of enlisted men, one judge, a noncommissioned officer (usually "adjutant," that is, regimental or battalion sergeant major).

Functions of commissaire and rapporteur combined in one officer, "commissaire-rapporteur"; appointed by commanding general; of rank not under captain, 25 years of age. Not required to be a lawyer—sometimes is and sometimes is not. Endeavor made during the war to procure lawyers for these positions.

No preliminary investigation whatever required. Commanding general may, in his discretion, by "direct order" (sec. 156, C. J. M.), order case to trial; or may order investigation.

3. "Special courts":

Emergency war boards established for the war by presidential decree September 6, 1914 (abolished by law in 1918).

Three judges appointed by commanding general, to serve at his pleasure. President an officer, not under field rank. Other two judges—(a) For trial of officers—officers; (b) for trial of enlisted man or civilian—one officer and one noncommissioned officer.

Commissaire-rapporteur appointed by the commanding general; required only to be an officer.

No preliminary investigation required; accused may be instantly ordered to trial. (The 24-hour interval before trial allowed accused in the ordinary conseil de guerre in the armies in active service, was not required in these "special courts").

Counsel for the accused appointed by the order referring case for trial; accused advised of the counsel appointed; allowed to choose other counsel if he so desires.

No appeal; sentences instantly carried into execution (except that execution of the death sentence required the order of the commanding officer who ordered the case for trial. This officer had the right in exceptional cases to delay the execution and ask the pleasure of the President of the Republic. In 1917 it was directed that all death sentences should thereafter be so referred to the President).

4. Court of Revision in the territorial armies:

Permanent courts of revision established at Paris, Bordeaux, Lyons. Territorial jurisdiction; Republic divided between them. Another court in Algiers.

Five judges, two civilians, three officers, as follows: Civilian president (a "president of the chamber of the (civilian) court of appeals"), civilian (a judge of the court of appeals), one colonel or lieutenant colonel, two majors.

Military judges appointed by commanding general for six months; civilian judges appointed as directed by the Government (cabinet). Each judge, civilian or military, must be 30 years of age. Military judges not required to have legal training.

Commissaire du gouvernement legal adviser to the court; a field officer, 30 years of age, appointed by the minister of war; not required to have legal training but in practice usually is a lawyer. (Col. Augier, commissaire du gouvernement of the court of revision at Paris, is a very eminent military lawyer and the author of several books on military law.)

Reviews for errors of law only. Appeals must be made within 24 hours after judgment in the court below. One day further allowed counsel for accused to file "memoir"; three days for one of the judges to report on the case to the court. The court then sits in public session; hears arguments from commissaire du gouvernement and counsel for the accused and enters judgment. (In practice additional time is sometimes allowed for preparation of the accused's "memoir.")

New trials may be ordered. The case is then sent for trial to some other court than the court which tried it the first time.

5. Court of revision in the armies on active service:

At headquarters of each division and army.

Five judges, all officers, as follows: One brigadier general (president), two colonels or lieutenant colonels, two majors. Appointed by commanding general, to serve at his pleasure.

Commissaire du gouvernement, officer of field rank, 30 years of age; appointed by the commanding general.

Jurisdiction and procedure as in territorial armies, except that in practice the time for accused to file his "memoir" is almost never extended.

In emergency the number of judges may be reduced to three.

6. Court of cassation:

Civilians (but not military persons) may have recourse to the court of cassation (supreme court of Republic of France) on jurisdictional questions only. This right is suspended whenever ordinary appeals to the courts of revision are suspended.

In time of peace, court of cassation exercises powers of court of revision (which is then suspended).

7. All right of appeal may be suspended during war or state of siege by presidential decree.

No appeal or other recourse lay from the "special courts" (emergency war courts). See above.

VII. GEN. ANSELL'S ACCUSATIONS AGAINST OTHERS BESIDES GEN. CROWDER.

(A) AGAINST GENERALS OF THE ARMY.

(a) "The weakest grade in the Army of the United States" (p. 121); which is the grade from which are drawn convening and reviewing authorities of courts-martial.

(b) "Many of them jokes to everybody else in the world except ourselves and themselves" (p. 121).

(c) "Lacking in experience" (p. 121); citing Gens. Pershing and Wood as examples, and saying:

(d) "That heterogeneous collection of troops on the Mexican border," "which Gen. Pershing commanded"; "no professional soldier would ever call that a division" (p. 122); and "the command in the Philippines was not the kind of command that required general leadership" (p. 122); and again:

(e) "I have had a hundred times their court-martial experience" (p. 121).

(B) AGAINST THE INSPECTOR GENERAL.

(a) "Thoroughly reactionary" (p. 116); "the most reactionary of men"; "prejudiced and reactionary" (p. 173); "whose views savor of professional absolutism" (p. 123).

(b) With trying to browbeat and intimidate Gen. Ansell, in connection with the investigation of Gen. Ansell's part in the present controversy, in trying to compel Gen. Ansell to make a statement against his will by threatening that "this thing is in Congress, and my report will go to Congress, and, Ansell, when it gets to Congress, it will be very detrimental to you" (p. 209).

(c) "With habitually using the power of his office in connection with investigations to compel accused persons and others to make statements against their will and to incriminate themselves, by menaces, threats, and intimidation" (p. 209).

(d) With allowing officers in his department in camp and division to compel testimony from suspected or accused soldiers, and then use it against them (p. 209).

(e) With having taken part with the Secretary of War and the Acting Judge Advocate General (Gen. Kreger) in frequent conferences with the court-martial committee of the American Bar Association, under such circumstances that "I, for one, as long as I live, will not express any respect for any such committee, no matter how high it may be or whatever association it may be a part of" (p. 214).

(C) AGAINST GEN. BIDDLE, FORMER ASSISTANT CHIEF OF STAFF.

(a) "Thoroughly reactionary" (p. 116).

(b) "Sharing with the Inspector General in views that savor of professional absolutism" (p. 123).

(D) AGAINST MAJ. GEN. KERNAN, MAJ. GEN. O'RYAN, AND LIEUT. COL. OGDEN, THE MEMBERS OF THE KERNAN-O'RYAN-OGDEN BOARD, AND LIEUT. COL. BARROWS, THE RECORDER OF THAT BOARD.

(a) "The most reactionary set of men in the United States" (p. 215).

(b) So prejudiced, and known to be so prejudiced, that many officers of high rank, holding liberal views, refused to express their views on military justice to that board (p. 215).

(E) AGAINST BRIG. GEN. E. A. KREGER, ACTING JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL OF THE ARMY.

(a) Not understanding his office; "brought to an office that he did not understand, and does not understand yet" (p. 165).

(b) With being opposed to and obstructing real clemency to prisoners (pp. 192-195, 204).

(c) With planning to disband the clemency board before it had considered the cases of prisoners from Europe (pp. 204-205), and with saying that the cases of those over there "would not require a second examination over here" (p. 207).

(d) With being, along with the Secretary of War, and the Judge Advocate General, in the attitude of "obstructing" the administration of clemency—"one of the obstructing officers" (p. 203).

(e) With pursuing (jointly with the Secretary of War, the Judge Advocate General, and the Inspector General) such methods with respect to the investigation conducted by the committee of the American Bar Association that "that investigation was never a fair investigation," but was so arranged that "that Bar Association committee sat there and heard and drank in the ultramilitary view, and they heard nothing else, except as I, single-handed, aided by one other officer, could present," "so that the departmental view might be impreguably maintained" (pp. 210, 211).

(f) With being, along with the Secretary of War and the Inspector General "in frequent contact" with the members of the American Bar Association committee, under such circumstances that "I for one, as long as I live, will express no respect for any such committee, no matter how high it may be, or whatever association it may be a part of" (pp. 211, 214).

(g) With having unjustly, in an unusual and harsh manner, and without notice, removed Col. Weeks, a Regular Army officer, "a distinguished officer," from duty in the office of the Judge Advocate General in Washington, to a relatively obscure station, which will carry immediate reduction to his Regular Army rank, because of his liberal views on clemency and concerning the system of the administration of military justice (pp. 162-163).

(F) AGAINST FORMER PRESIDENT TAFT.

(a) Perverting "his power to the furtherance of a plan * * * to maintain the existing vicious system of military justice and to do me great personal injury" (statement of Gen. Ansell, New York World, Sept. 16, 1919).

(b) Abusing "the confidence and trust of the American people and" misleading "them" (ibid); and

(c) Debasing "his exalted position as ex-President of the Republic to become an ignorant and bitter partisan in behalf of his friend," Gen. Crowder (ibid).

(G) AGAINST THE CHIEF OF STAFF.

(a) With joining with the Secretary of War, the Judge Advocate General, and the Acting Judge Advocate General in getting in touch and conferring with the court-martial committee of the American Bar Association (p. 211), so influencing that committee and its work that "its investigation was never a fair investigation."

(b) With joining "the whole military hierarchy, capped by your Chief of Staff," in clamoring and entering "into an agreement that these men should die," i. e., Ledoyen, Fishback, Sebastian, and Cook, "the four death cases from France," to whom the President showed clemency.

(H) AGAINST CHIEFS OF BUREAUS.

(a) Joining "to protest and resist the establishment of any revisory power in the War Department" (p. 207), and

(b) Inducing the Secretary of War "by an organized military bureaucracy to use the great power of his office to oppress, to destroy any who would dare differ with that bureaucracy" (p. 171).

(I) AGAINST THE COURT-MARTIAL COMMITTEE OF THE AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION.

(a) "Being a packed committee" (p. 211), "chosen as a result * * * of strenuous efforts being made by the War Department to bolster up their cause" (p. 214).

(b) That certain members of the committee "came to the investigation with minds foreclosed" (pp. 212-213), and that those members "have not been without their influence upon the other members of the committee" (p. 213).

(c) With so misconducting their investigation that "that investigation was never a fair investigation" (p. 210), and that "the hearing has not been thorough and it has not been fair" (p. 214).

(d) With misconducting their investigation in that "that committee * * * came here, got into touch with the War Department and the Judge Advocate General of the Army, got a list of witnesses from them, and called those witnesses and no other witnesses until just about four days before their hearings, which had extended over four or five weeks, were about to close. They then, condescendingly, gave me an opportunity to appear and called one other officer voicing my views, and then they asked me if I had a list of names * * * in advocacy of my side of the matter, and when I handed in that list they left * * * within 48 hours before any but one of those gentlemen could get here" (p. 210); "and so that Bar Association committee sat there and heard and drank in the ultramilitary view, and they heard nothing else except as I, single-handed, aided by one other officer, could present" (p. 210).

(e) With conferring "with the Secretary of War, the Chief of Staff, the Judge Advocate General of the Army, and the Acting Judge Advocate General of the Army" (p. 211), and with being "in frequent contact with the Secretary of War and the Acting Judge Advocate General and the Inspector General" (p. 214), so that "whatever respect anybody else may have for such a committee I, for one, as long as I live, will not express any respect for any such committee, no matter how high it may be or whatever association it may be a part of" (p. 214).

(f) "The committee did not ask the department, so far as I am advised, to direct any officer of the Army whose name was cited by me, to appear before it, and consequently any officer or other person whom I desired called in opposition to the system could appear only by taking leave, if he were entitled to leave, and at his own expense" (p. 213).

(J) AGAINST THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

(a) "Thoroughly reactionary" (p. 116);

(b) With having submitted to Congress "in bad faith, not really desiring the bill passed nor wanting any such power granted (p. 111), on January 19, 1918, a bill to vest in the President revisory power over the findings and sentences of courts-martial" (p. 111);

(c) With having "arrayed himself with the solid phalanx of the Army—principally of the Regular Army—in support of this system" (p. 173); i. e., in support of the existing system of military justice, elsewhere in the testimony denounced as a "system of organized injustice";

(d) With being "content, however, to be imposed upon" (p. 117);

(e) With having, along with the Judge Advocate General, "resorted to methods which, if adopted by a man in his dealings with another man privately, would merit and receive the severest condemnation" (p. 169);

(f) With having been "induced by an organized military bureaucracy to use the great power of his office to oppress, to destroy, anyone who would dare differ with that bureaucracy" (p. 171);

(g) With having "demoted" or concurred in the demoting of Gen. Ansell from the rank of temporary brigadier general to his Regular Army grade of lieutenant colonel, within but little more than a month after bestowing upon him the distinguished service medal, as a punishment for testifying before the Senate Military Affairs Committee; not for stating other than the truth, but for "divulging the secrets of the system, giving away State secrets, things that we want to keep away from Congress and the public" (p. 161; with withholding the order so that it would not be published until the day after Congress adjourned last March (p. 164); and with pretending that "my demotion had absolutely nothing to do with my connection with the criticism of the existing system" (p. 164);

(h) With sending clear to France to get another brigadier general to put in Gen. Ansell's place as Acting Judge Advocate General (p. 164), who (Gen. Kreger) did not understand the office to which he was brought, "and does not understand yet" (p. 165);

(i) With having pretended that Gen. Ansell's demotion "was in line with the general demobilization of the Judge Advocate General's Department; that there were to be no more promotions in that department"; yet with having made "more colonels in that department since I was demoted than before" (p. 164);

(j) With having failed to make any fair investigation of charges against the Army court-martial system (n. 167); but, on the contrary

(k) With having entered into a deliberate conspiracy with the Judge Advocate General and Col. John H. Wigmore for "a plan of campaign to maintain and defend the existing system at all costs, and discredit the complaints and destroy the complainants" (pp. 165-6); and for that purpose—

(l) With establishing a "propaganda bureau" with "several officers and 13 or 14 clerks assigned solely for this purpose, and the Government of the United States paid their salaries" (n. 168);

(m) With having, through this "propaganda bureau," in pursuance of this conspiracy, prepared "a statement for the press," devoted largely to discrediting me" (n. 166);

(n) With having, through this "bureau," published another "very elaborate" 70-page statement "devoted to encomiums upon the system" (Gen. Crowder's letter of Mar. 10, 1918), of which 90,000 copies were sent out (n. 168), "as part of the propaganda to maintain this system and to discredit those who would attack it"; and that "the truth is not in that document," and that the cases cited in that document "are not only not fairly handled, they are falsely and untruthfully presented" (n. 169); "all with the purpose that the Congress of the United and the lawyers of the United States might be misled and deceived" (n. 169);

(o) With having appointed to investigate the subject of military justice and Gen. Ansell's own part in it, "the Inspector General, the most reactionary of men" * * * "the very man whom in the brief," prepared by Gen. Ansell in December, 1917, upon the power of the Judge Advocate General, "I labeled as prejudiced and reactionary" (n. 173);

(p) With having, in November, 1917, directed or consented that the Judge Advocate General relieve Gen. Ansell from all connection with the administration of military justice because of the latter's liberal views (n. 183);

(q) With having opposed clemency to prisoners, "the departmental line-up was against clemency" (n. 182), and with having, when the clemency board was finally instituted last winter, decided that the cases of prisoners overseas should not be taken up, because "they were over there * * * and that people would not be so interested in extending clemency to prisoners so circumstanced as here at home" (n. 191);

(r) With being, along with the Judge Advocate General and Gen. Kreger, in the attitude of "obstructing" the administration of clemency (n. 203);

(s) With having arranged to mislead the committee of the American Bar Association investigating court-martial procedure, by facilitating the appearance before it of witnesses favorable to "the system" and obstructing the appearance of other military witnesses before it, so that the investigation of that committee "was never a fair investigation" (p. 210); and even that

(t) The members of that committee itself "were chosen as the result of strenuous efforts made by the War Department to bolster up their cause" (p. 214);

(u) With having, immediately upon his return from Europe last May, because "it was in the air" that the American Bar Association committee's report might be unfavorable to the department (pp. 214-15), appointed another committee—the Kernan-O’Ryan-Ogden Board—composed of “the most reactionary set of men in the United States” (p. 215);

(v) In short, with being wholly dominated by the reactionary views of the Judge Advocate General and of the most reactionary section of the Army, and being willing to stoop to any means whatever to prevent any improvement and to destroy anyone seeking to disturb the present system.

(K) AGAINST PROF. JOHN H. WIGMORE.

Prof. John H. Wigmore, dean of the law school of Northwestern University, author of “Wigmore on Evidence” and many other books, and known throughout the world as one of the foremost legal authorities in the United States, formerly a colonel in the Judge Advocate General’s Department, has been denounced as:

(a) “A new thought man in the legal world” (p. 265), to whom “the Constitution does not mean very much”, to whom the Constitution “seems to have been the result of a long course of foolish thought by our people” (p. 265);

(b) With being a man opposed to clemency, or “not zealous in according clemency” (pp. 191-192);

(c) With having entered, with the Secretary of War and the Judge Advocate General, into a conspiracy and “Campaign to maintain and defend the existing system at all costs, and discredit the complaints and destroy the complainants” (pp. 166, 231); and with having become chief of the “propaganda bureau” organized pursuant to that conspiracy (p. 168), with 13 or 14 clerks under him, assigned solely for that purpose, with their salaries paid by the Government (p. 168);

(d) With having, as chief of that “propaganda bureau,” prepared first, a long statement, signed by the Judge Advocate General, devoted to discrediting and destroying Gen. Ansell (p. 166), and thereafter the 70-page pamphlet letter of the Judge Advocate General to the Secretary of War on “Military Justice during the War,” dated March 10, 1919, of which 90,000 copies were “published and sent to all the lawyers, preachers, and other professional men as part of the propaganda to maintain this system and discredit those who would attack it” (pp. 168-169, 231, 232); and that

(e) “The truth is not in that document”; that the cases cited in that document “are not only not fairly handled, they are falsely and untruthfully presented” (p. 169);

(f) With employing, along with the Secretary of War and the Judge Advocate General, such methods “as when employed in private affairs habitually receive the condemnation of honest men and discredit any cause” (p. 231).

VIII. SUMMARY OF THE INSPECTOR GENERAL’S FINDINGS.

The Inspector General, after a painstaking investigation of the facts in controversy, made a detailed report to the Secretary of War May 8, 1919. The report contained specific findings supported by the facts upon which they are based, adverse to the contentions of Gen. Ansell, as follows:

1. "Gen. Ansell's charge that he was relieved from duty as Acting Judge Advocate General, by reason of the difference of opinion as to section 1199, Revised Statutes, is without foundation in fact." (P. 10.)

2. "His (Gen. Ansell's) statement, repeatedly made, that General Orders No. 7, adopted to carry out the very views which he, himself, first advocated, were 'an administrative palliative,' is not in accord with the facts and is another instance where the public has been misled." (P. 17.)

3. "The fact remains that, at the time the order was issued, Gen. Crowder was Judge Advocate General of the Army and should have been consulted by his assistant, Gen. Ansell, in regard to a change of policy so radical as that effected by General Orders No. 84 and known by Gen. Ansell to be contrary to the declared policy of the Judge Advocate General and the Secretary of War." (P. 22.)

4. "From the records and from all obtainable evidence, it appears that Gen. Ansell's statement that, from November, 1917, to April, 1918, he had nothing to do with the administration of military justice and that the proceedings did not come over his desk, is not in accord with the facts. On the contrary, it appears that his initiative and authority as senior assistant remained undisturbed and that he was in no degree hampered in any changes which, within the law, he desired to make." (P. 26.)

5. "The above facts, stripped of all elements of uncertainty, lead to the conviction that Gen. Ansell's statements (concerning the four death cases from France) as to his attitude and activities in connection with the cases above considered, are misleading and widely variant from the facts." (P. 31.)

6. "Gen. Ansell does not claim that he originated the idea (clemency boards), but that the basis for the plan was his memorandum dated January 11, 1919. That is true. The Secretary of War, however, himself made the initial suggestion, and the order creating the board followed the lines laid down by him." (P. 36.)

7. "It is believed that the Judge Advocate General's Department has functioned during the war with the interests and rights of the enlisted men constantly in mind, and that the various steps taken and the measures adopted have been for the single purpose of safeguarding those interests and rights. It has been successful, except in a few isolated instances, in accomplishing that purpose." (P. 57.)

IX. GEN. CROWDER'S ATTITUDE TOWARD RETURN OF ACQUITTALS FOR RECONSIDERATION.

NOTE.—This is now ancient history, since it has been prohibited by General Order No. 88, War Department, July 14, 1919, which was recommended by Gen. Crowder.

(A) CHARGE OF GEN. ANSELL RESPECTING THE RETURN TO COURT OF ACQUITTALS.

Gen. Ansell before the Committee on Military Affairs, replying to a question by Senator Chamberlain, inquiring whether or not the War Department had not recently issued an order prohibiting the return to courts by reviewing authorities of acquittals for reconsideration said:

Yes; although that has been agitated for 18 years, I know, and the War Department has insisted that that was a proper thing, and the Judge Advocate General of the Army, in the very hearings before the committee beginning in 1912 and terminating in 1916, insisted that that was a proper thing, that it was necessary for discipline; and when he sent the bill to your committee in the spring of 1918 conferring this revisory power, he went before the House Committee and argued for the advisability of permitting this court to reverse acquittals, and he said that he had seen many instances in his service where justice would not have been done if the acquittal had been adhered to (p. 127).

Answer.—A careful examination of the hearings of 1912 and 1916 on the 1916 revision has been made, with the result that there is not found therein any reference by Gen. Crowder to the practice of reviewing authorities returning acquittals to courts for reconsideration.

In the hearings before the House Committee on the bill to place in the President revisory power, Gen. Crowder stated the following respecting the return of acquittals to courts by reviewing authorities:

It has been permissible ever since we have had an Army for the President, in any case requiring his action, to return the case to the court and ask them to reconsider the sentence, with a view to imposing a more adequate sentence or a different form of sentence, but there is no power in the President of the United States or the Secretary of War or any authority to increase the punishment beyond what the court will sanction on reconsideration (p. 37).

He has always had that power (referring to the power of the reviewing authority to return the finding and sentence to a court indicating the punishment inadequate). They have it under the English articles, from which we draw our own. They have had it from time immemorial; it has been the rule that the convening authority could address the trial court upon the adequacy or inadequacy of the judgment and sentence of the court (p. 40).

The commanding general can not increase it (referring to the punishment). He can only address the court as to the sufficiency of the sentence. That has been the law ever since we have had a Government, and ever since we have had an Army, and that is the law in England, going back as far as our written codes go (p. 42).

I have had cases come up where a very small sentence was given for the gravest crime, and I do not know anything that would attack discipline more, if the commanding general, who is also the reviewing officer, or the Secretary of War or the President, who will become the reviewing officers of that class of cases under this legislation, could not invite the attention of the court to the effect of such a sentence upon the discipline of the Army generally. I do not think this would have survived all the centuries without criticism if it were intrinsically wrong (p. 42).

I believe a large number of the cases returned by the convening authorities to courts-martial are with a view to imposing a different form of sentence and frequently a more lenient one (p. 43).

Gen. Crowder stated at this hearing that in perhaps a majority of cases the courts adhered to their original sentences upon reconsideration, adding:

There is a great deal of independence. You will find, I think, more cases where the reviewing authority, in commenting upon a case, in the order of promulgation, disapproves than you will find where the reviewing authority approves the action of a court upon revision (p. 44).

On February 26, 1919, Gen. Crowder before the Senate Military Committee in discussing the provision in the Chamberlain bill, which attempts to preclude the reviewing authority from returning to courts acquittals for reconsideration, stated, referring to the practice of returning acquittals:

Let me say, first, it is simply a regulation and there is no law under which it is done. The War Department could wipe out the regulation to-night and could establish this very prohibition by an order (p. 247).

Further in this hearing Gen. Crowder stated, in commenting upon the power of the reviewing authority to return acquittals, that:

I think this way about it: It shocks the American people to have a verdict of acquittal reconsidered, and for that reason I am not disposed to insist upon continuing the ancient rule of returning them. I have never known, in a rather protracted period of service, of an innocent man who has suffered through this procedure, and I have certainly known of many miscarriages of justice that have been corrected (p. 254).

I am not disposed to insist upon retention of that rule. I have sometimes thought we would be justified in revoking the present rule and try out the other system of reporting the result at the proper time, but I fear we should get all kinds of protest from the reviewing authorities, commanding officers who have authority to convene courts-martial (p. 255).

Subsequent to the hearing of February 26, 1919, Gen. Crowder directed the preparation of a draft of general order to prohibit reviewing authorities from returning acquittals to courts. As a result of this movement in this matter, General Order No. 88, War Department, 1919, was published on July 14, 1919, wherein it is provided:

1. No authority will return a record of trial to any military tribunal for reconsideration of—

- (a) An acquittal; or
- (b) A finding of not guilty of any specification; or
- (c) A finding of not guilty of any charge, unless the record shows a finding of guilty on a specification laid under that charge which sufficiently alleges a violation of some article of war; or
- (d) The sentence originally imposed with a view to increasing its severity, unless such sentence is less than the mandatory sentence fixed by law for the offense or offenses upon which a conviction has been had.

2. No military tribunal in any proceedings on revision shall reconsider its finding or sentence in any particular in which a return of the record of trial for such reconsideration is herein prohibited.

3. This order will be effective from and after August 10, 1919.

(B) SAME SUBJECT: GEN. CROWDER'S ATTITUDE.

Charge.—On page 127 of the report of the hearings, Senator Chamberlain interrogated Gen. Ansell respecting the sending back of a case of acquittal, and Gen. Ansell replied, saying:

The Judge Advocate General of the Army, in the very hearings before the committee beginning in 1912 and terminating in 1916, insisted that that was a proper thing; that it was necessary for discipline; and when he sent the bill to your committee in the spring of 1918 conferring this revisory power he went before the House committee and argued for the advisability of permitting the court to reverse acquittals, and he said that he had seen many instances in his service where justice would not have been done if the acquittal had been adhered to (p. 127).

Answer.—The reference here is without any doubt to the hearing on H. R. 23628, the original of the 1916 revision, before the House committee—the hearings beginning in April, 1912; and also to the hearings on S. 3191 before the Senate Subcommittee on Military Affairs in February of 1916, and, as I have said, these are the antecedents of the much-talked-of revision of 1916. Gen. Ansell says in these hearings that I argued for the advisability of permitting the court to reverse acquittals. A very careful examination of these hearings has been made which disclosed that nothing whatever was said by me upon that subject.

Gen. Ansell further says that I came before this committee in the spring of 1918 and argued for the advisability of permitting the court to reverse acquittals. What I said was this: Senator Wadsworth asked whether or not I had any comments to make generally on the power of reviewing authorities returning papers after acquittals, and I said:

I think this way about it: It shocks the American people to have a verdict of acquittal reconsidered, and for that reason I am not disposed to insist upon continuing the ancient rule of returning them. I have never known, in a rather protracted period of service, of an innocent man who has suffered through this procedure, and I have certainly known of many miscarriages of justice that have been corrected.

On the closely related subject of the practice of reviewing authorities sending inadequate sentences back for revision upward I said:

I have a number of cases which I want to put in the record in order that you may see the use that military authorities make of this power of sending inadequate sentences back for revision upward, and see whether it is an abuse or not. I am not disposed to insist upon retention of that rule. I have sometimes thought that we would be justified in revoking the present rule and trying out the other system of reporting the result at the proper time, but I fear we should get all kinds of protests from the reviewing authorities, commanding officers, who have the authority to convene courts-martial (pp. 254-255, hearings on S. 5320).

I have been entirely frank with the committee in giving the substance of this testimony. I am using the incident to show you how frequently the statements of the principal critic are, in fact, misstatements.

(C) RETURN OF CASES TO COURT FOR RECONSIDERATION OR CORRECTION. RECOGNITION AND APPROVAL OF THE POWER.

The power to send a case back to the court for revision, reconsideration, or correction has been recognized as existing independently of express statute from early times.

In 1842 Attorney General Legare advised President Tyler as follows:

In military courts-martial the power of the commander by whom they have been convened to direct them, in the event of disapproval, to revise their sentence and reconsider the proceedings, has never been doubted, and is rested solely upon the ground that the sentences of such courts are not to be put in execution until approved by that commander (4 Ops. Atty. Gen., 19).

In 1853 Attorney General Caleb Cushing wrote as follows:

It is laid down as a thing not open to controversy in all the books of military law that the superior authority may order a court-martial to reassemble to revise its proceedings and sentence. * * * The power of ordering a case back to a court-martial for revision must be conceded as indubitably existing both as to the Army and the Navy of the United States. Its apparent singularity arises from the want of careful scrutiny of the thing done, and of the nature of a court-martial in its relation to the confirming power. (6 Ops. Atty. Gen., 200, 203-204.)

Such was the state of opinion when the Supreme Court of the United States had occasion to pass upon the subject in 1879. A paymaster's clerk of the Navy, named Reed, was tried by court-martial for certain malfeasance in his official duties, found guilty, and sentenced. The revising authority, Rear Admiral Nichols, returned the case to the court with the statement that the finding was in accordance with the evidence, but that he considered the sentence inadequate. Thereupon the court reconsidered the sentence, revoked it, and substituted another and severer punishment, which the revising authority approved. Reed then sued out a writ of habeas corpus in the United States Circuit Court, which court, after a hearing, discharged the writ and remanded the prisoner. Thereupon Reed petitioned the Supreme Court of the United States for writs of habeas corpus and certiorari. In both courts Reed attacked the validity of the court-martial proceedings on the grounds, first, that he as a paymaster's clerk was not amenable to trial by court-martial; and, second, that the last sentence of the court-martial was void. Upon the latter point it was urged before the Supreme Court that Rear Admiral Nichols had no lawful authority for doing what was done; that at most he was authorized to direct the court to reconsider its sentence only for the purpose of correcting a mistake in matters of law or fact, whereas he had directed a reconsideration of the court's judgment within the limits of its discretion; that when the court passed its first sentence and forwarded the record it exhausted its powers and ceased to exist; and that Reed had been twice put in peril for the same offense and deprived of his liberty without due process of law in violation of the constitutional guarantee. The Supreme Court, after holding that a paymaster's clerk was within the jurisdiction of the court-martial, held that the revising authority's return of the record and the court-martial's subsequent action thereon were valid and legal acts. The syllabus of the case states the court's ruling as follows:

Where, pursuant to such (Navy) regulations, a general court-martial is duly ordered, the officer clothed with the revising authority may, before it is dissolved, direct it to reconsider its proceedings and sentence; and if it, upon being reconvened, renders a sentence which he approves, such sentence can not be collaterally impeached for mere errors or irregularities, if any such were committed by the court while acting within the sphere of its authority.

A., the clerk of a paymaster in the Navy, was, by a court-martial, found guilty of certain charges and specifications of malfeasance in the discharge of his official duties. Sentence was passed upon him, and transmitted, with the record, to the revising officer, who returned it with a letter stating that the finding was in accordance with the evidence, but that he differed with the court as to the adequacy of the sentence. The court proceeded to revise it, and, after revoking it, substituted another, which he approved, inflicting upon A. a severer punishment. A., who was imprisoned pursuant thereto, alleging that it was illegal and void, and that he was thereby unlawfully deprived of his liberty, prayed for a writ of habeas corpus. Held, that the court-martial had jurisdiction of the person and of the subject matter, and was competent to pass the sentence whereof A. complained. (Ex parte Reed, 100 U. S., 13.)

In 1893 the Court of Claims considered the validity of a sentence passed by a court-martial upon Gen. Swaim. In 1884 Gen. Swaim had been charged with conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman, in connection with certain alleged frauds. He was tried by a court-martial appointed by the President, acquitted of the specific charge, but found guilty of conduct prejudicial to good order and military discipline, and sentenced. The President, the reviewing authority in this case, disapproved the sentence as incommensurate with the offense, and returned the case to the court for reconsideration. The court-martial then imposed another sentence, which President Arthur disapproved as not authorized by law and again returned the record to the court, which imposed a third sentence, severer than the first. The last sentence was approved by the President and carried into effect. Six years afterwards its validity was attacked by Gen. Swaim in an action to recover his forfeited pay in the Court of Claims. The syllabus of the case in the Court of Claims contains the following upon the subject of reconsideration by courts-martial on return of the record by the reviewing officer:

The Army regulation, 1881, No. 923, authorizes the reviewing officer to reconvene a court so that it may correct or modify its conclusions, but does not authorize him to interfere with the proper discretion of the court.

Where the President disapproved of a sentence which was within the discretion of the court, on the ground that it was incommensurate with the offense, the case comes within the decision of the Supreme Court in ex parte Reed (100 U. S. R., 13) that the reviewing officer did not thereby require the court to impose a more severe sentence.

Speaking of the return of cases to courts-martial for reconsideration and of the legality of the reviewing officer's action in suggesting to the court the inadequacy of its sentence, the Court of Claims in the opinion in this case by Justice Nott, which later received the expressed approval of the Supreme Court, said:

The question presented by the case it believed to be a new one, unless it be identical in legal effect with that which was before the Supreme Court in ex parte Reed (100 U. S. R., 13). In that case there was an unequivocal offense involving no discretion on the part of the court, viz. "malfeasance in the discharge of his official duty." In this case it was necessarily within the discretion of the court-martial to determine whether the acts constituted an offense; and, if so, its gravity, seriousness, and degree. In both cases the punishment was within the discretion of the court; in both cases the reviewing officer disapproved the leniency of the sentence; and in both cases the court-martial complied with his recommendation and imposed a severer punishment. On the one hand, it may be said of this case that the President did not interfere with the discretion of the court; that he did not require it to impose a more severe sentence; that he merely invited it to reconsider its determination of the case, and left it free to reimpose the same sentence or to impose a milder one or a more severe one. On the other hand, it may be said that the disapproval of the sentence which the court in the lawful exercise of its discretion had imposed did not leave it free to reimpose the same sentence; that disapproving it on the express ground that it was too lenient, in effect compelled the court to impose a more severe one; that in military life a superior officer is conceded to be invested with superior wisdom; and that in such cases the reviewing officer should not be allowed to interfere with the judgment of the tribunal in which discretion is exclusively vested by law.

But while the last principle is a sound one, which civil tribunals should carefully maintain, it is believed by this court that the decision of the court of last resort in ex parte Reed is conclusive upon this branch of the case. (Swain v. U. S., 28 Ct. Cls., 173, 235.)

The Swain case was appealed from the Court of Claims to the United States Supreme Court, which affirmed the decision at the October term, 1896. The syllabus of the Supreme Court decision states:

The action of the President in twice returning the proceedings of the court-martial, urging a more severe sentence, was authorized by law; and a sentence made after such action, and in consequence of it, was valid.

In the opinion of the Supreme Court delivered by Mr. Justice Shiras the claim that the reviewing officer was without authority in returning the proceedings to the court-martial and that his action in urging greater severity invalidated the sentence of the court, was noticed and commented upon as follows:

It is claimed that the action of the President in thus twice returning the proceedings to the court-martial, urging a more severe sentence, was without authority of law, and that the said last sentence having resulted from such illegal conduct was absolutely void. * * * In ex parte Reed (100 U. S., 13) a somewhat similar contention was made. There a court-martial had imposed a sentence which was transmitted with the record to Admiral Nichols, the reviewing officer, who returned it with a letter stating that the finding was in accordance with the evidence, but that he differed with the court as to the adequacy of the sentence. The court revised the sentence and substituted another and more severe sentence, which was approved. The accused filed a petition for a writ of habeas corpus in this court; and it was claimed that the court had exhausted its powers in making the first sentence, and, also, that it was not competent for the court-martial to give effect to the views of the revising officer by imposing a second sentence of more severity. The Navy Regulations were cited to the effect that the authority who ordered the court was competent to direct it to reconsider its proceedings and sentence for the purpose of correcting any mistake which may have been committed, but that it was not within the power of the revising authority to compel a court to change its sentence, where, upon being reconvened by him, they have refused to modify it, nor directly or indirectly to enlarge the measure of punishment imposed by sentence of a court-martial.

This court held that such regulations have the force of law, but that as the court-martial had jurisdiction over the person and the case, its proceedings could not be collaterally impeached for any mere error or irregularity committed within the sphere of its authority; that the matters complained of were within the jurisdiction of the court-martial; that the second sentence was not void; and, accordingly, the application for a writ of habeas corpus was denied. We agree with the Court of Claims that the ruling in ex parte Reed, in principle, decides the present question.—(Swiam v. U. S., 165 U. S., 553, 554-555.)

X. COURTS-MARTIAL IN GEN. ANSELL'S COMMAND WHILE HE WAS A COMPANY COMMANDER.

In his testimony before this subcommittee Gen. Ansell further states:

I commanded a company from the time I left the Military Academy for three years and then for two years more; and many of these generals had done no more, and many less; and I congratulate myself that I commanded it without a resort to courts-martial, even summary courts, except in the rarest instances (p. 121). (Italics supplied.)

Answer.—Let the record speak. I insert a memorandum from The Adjutant General of the Army.

For the Judge Advocate General of the Army:

The records of this office show that Lieut. S. T. Ansell was in command of Company A, Eleventh United States Infantry, on June 23 and 24, 1899; of Company D, same regiment, from some time in November or December, 1899 (actual date not shown) to May 22, 1900; of Company M, same regiment, from September 19, 1900, to October 9, 1900; of Company I, same regiment, from October 27, 1900, to September 14, 1901; of part of Company K, same regiment (in an expedition against insurgents in Southern Samar), from September 29, 1901, to October 6, 1901, and from October 18, 1901, to October 25, 1901; of Company K, from March 18, 1905, to April 8, 1905, and May 7 to May 13, 1905, and from June 23, 1905, to August 4, 1905; of Company D, from August 14, 1905, to April 30, 1906.

During the periods specified above courts-martial for 128 members of the several companies commanded by Lieut. Ansell are shown as follows:

SUMMARY COURTS-MARTIAL (128).

- Sergt. Joseph L. Anthony, fined $2, November 13, 1899, and $5 December 12, 1899.
- Corpl. James B. Logan, fined $2, December 2, 1899.
- Pvt. Thomas Behan, fined $1 November 14, 1899, and $8 December 14, 1899.
- Pvt. Robert F. Clifford, fined $5 December 14, 1899.
- Pvt. William Cocroft, fined $10 November 29, 1899.
- Pvt. Frank Donnelly, fined $14, December 11, 1899.
- Pvt. Robert J. Doyle, fined $5, December 11, 1899.
- Pvt. George Harrison, fined $5, November 13, 1899.
- Pvt. William J. Henry, fined $1, November 27, 1899.

P. C. HARRIS,
The Adjutant General.

OCTOBER 6, 1919.

It is fair to state that such investigation as it has been possible to make (necessarily complicated and incomplete) indicates that the number of trials in the company commanded by Lieut. Ansell is below the average of other companies of Infantry for the same period: but the statement that he resorted to courts-martial, even to summary courts, only in the rarest instances, is not justified. In view of the small punishment inflicted in many of the cases, it would seem that the infractions could have been made the subject of company discipline.

ESTABLISHMENT OF MILITARY JUSTICE—PROPOSED AMENDMENT OF THE ARTICLES OF WAR.

---

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 3, 1919.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to the call of the chairman, in the room of the Committee on Appropriations, at 10.30 o'clock a. m., Senator Francis E. Warren presiding.

Present: Senators Warren, chairman, Lenroot, and Chamberlain.

STATEMENT OF HON. NEWTON D. BAKER, SECRETARY OF WAR

Senator WARREN. Mr. Secretary, it is not necessary to explain to you what we have before us, because you understand that it is the matter of military justice. We have been getting considerable testimony in this matter, and we should be glad to have you make a statement to us in your own way.

Secretary BAKER. Senator, I feel that your hearings have been so exhaustive, and so many matters of record have been dealt with, and the records have all been put into the testimony, so that perhaps we would make more progress in getting any contribution that I can make if the members of the committee would ask me questions about any things that still remain unanswered in their minds. I have relied upon Gen. Crowder to present the records of the Department as far as any record is admissible, and I understand he has done so in a very voluminous and full way, and I scarcely know in what direction you desire to have me testify.

Senator WARREN. Senator Chamberlain, will you proceed with the Secretary?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. Secretary, you have read over the proposed Articles of War—Senate bill 64. I believe it is called—written by Gen. Ansell, have you?

Secretary BAKER. Yes; quite casually, Senator.

Senator WARREN. Here is a comparative print of the present Articles of War, with that bill, in parallel columns.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The fact that that bill was introduced by me does not indicate that I approve of all the provisions in it. It was prepared by Gen. Ansell at the request of some members of the committee at the hearings had in February, 1919. There are some changes in the present Articles of War which are quite radical, and I am not prepared to agree with them in their entirety, but some of the features I would like to ask you about; namely, first, providing for some method of appeal other than now exists for a man convicted by court-martial.

Secretary BAKER. I have not had a great deal of time to follow, and I can not say that I have followed, with completeness, the hearings that have been had before this committee on that subject.

As I have observed the system of court-martial administration, or military justice administration, in the department, the chief defect of which I have been personally conscious was the inability of the final reviewing authority, which is the President, to quash a trial and order a trial de novo. A very large number of cases have been presented to me as the adviser of the President in the matter, in which apparently there was a dereliction of duty which ought to have been disciplined, and yet with a defect in the record of such a character as to make it quite impossible to administer discipline upon such a record, with the result that the proceeding had to be disapproved, and no further trial had. I think that is a mistake in any system of justice. I think there ought to be an opportunity for reversal on either the facts or the law, and a trial de novo.

I can illustrate what I mean by this. For instance, I do not want to deal with a case by name, but I will deal with the outstanding facts of a case. An officer was tried, and about a thousand pages of record taken. He was convicted by the court-martial of improper relations with a woman. The question as to whether he was guilty or not depended upon the continuance of a prior marriage of the woman, and that, in turn, depended upon the validity, vel non, of the divorce decree which she had sought from her previous husband; unless the husband from whom the divorce was sought had in fact died at the time of her marriage with the officer, in which case, of course, there would have been no necessity for the divorce. The record, although it contained a thousand pages of testimony, was silent on the question as to whether or not the previous husband was still living. We had the conflict of presumptions to deal with: First, the presumption of continued life in the previous husband; second, the presumption of innocence on the part of the officer; and as the officer at the time that he was supposed to be guilty of this wrong-doing had contracted another marriage, the presumption of innocence of the immediate offense with which he was charged involved a presumption of guilt of bigamy in order to clothe him with a presumption of innocence of the offense with which he was charged. I am a lawyer. I went over the case with very great care, personally, I had it inspected by a large number of lawyers, and every lawyer agreed that that record was fatally defective, and the officer was finally acquitted of any wrongdoing. In the meantime the husband whose continuance of life was the essential omission from the record was known by everybody to be walking about the streets in perfect disregard of any presumption. I think that is the kind of a case in which the power to reverse or modify or affirm is a very important power, and so far as my observation of it goes, or my reflection on the subject, the bill which I sent to Senator Chamberlain and to Mr. Dent in the year 1918, giving the President as Commander in Chief of the Army the right to reverse or modify, would have accomplished all that was necessary in that particular class of cases.

On the general question of a court of appeal I can only make observations without reaching a settled judgment. Obviously, nobody ought to object, and I think nobody would object, to an appellate tribunal that would pass upon these cases, if it were not for the fact that war is a very different state of affairs from peace. If you had an appellate tribunal functioning in the Army in peace times, its value, I think, would go without saying. No harm could come to anybody by reason of the delay that would come by reason of having the appeal sought. The French have that; but when the emergency of war comes, the President of the French Republic, by decree, suspends the functions of the appellate power, as I understand it. I think that is open to at least these objections: First, that it warns the soldier that the bars are down, so that he feels, inevitably, that some safeguard which is thrown around him in time of peace is stricken away from him in time of war, that I think must have a bad effect on the soldier.

In the second place, I think it is notice to the officers that they are no longer restrained by the normal peace time restraints; and so I am fearful that having a procedure which may be conceded to be wise in time of peace, but which is stricken down in time of war, would have the double effect of making the soldiers feel that they were without a customary remedy, and making the officers feel the lack of the same responsibility which they feel in time of peace because they know their proceedings are going to be reviewed. As a matter of fact, and I speak now only from my personal observation, I have read literally hundreds of court-martial records, and my own experience as a lawyer has been upon the public side. I was city solicitor of Cleveland for a great many years, and as such solicitor had charge of the prosecutions in the city courts of Cleveland. Bringing that experience to the examination of these records, I am persuaded from such records as I have seen that the sense of responsibility on the part of the officers compares very favorably with the sense of responsibility that you find in civil courts anywhere. I think that the explanation of that lies in this, that officers know that they will not maintain discipline unless they have the respect of their men, and that the sort of respect which they must have must be based on reputation for being just in their treatment of their men. I think, looking over records that I have seen, and judging the processes by the opportunities of observation that I have had, that there is no disposition on the part of courts-martial to be either more summary in their judgment of the facts, or less careful in their application of the law, or more severe in their adjudication of penalties, than is customary in the ordinary criminal courts of the country.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Taking the case that you used by way of illustration a while ago, the particular officer in question was acquitted by the court-martial?

Secretary BAKER. No; he was convicted by the court-martial.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And was the conviction sustained by the approving authority?

Secretary BAKER. The conviction was sustained by the convening authority.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes. That was the commanding officer?

Secretary BAKER. The commanding general; yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It was approved by him?

Secretary BAKER. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Then the record came to the Office of the Judge Advocate General?

Secretary BAKER. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Then what course was pursued?

Secretary BAKER. The Judge Advocate General reviewed the record and said that the proceedings were fatally defective, and I finally adopted his view and recommended to the President that he disapprove the proceedings, as they involved dismissal and they had to come to the President; and the President disapproved the proceedings.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. But there was no power in the Judge Advocate General or in the Secretary of War to pass upon the case and act, yourselves?

Secretary BAKER. There was not; and in my judgment ought not to be.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. There is not in any of these cases, is there? You know the controversy, of course, between Gen. Ansell and others as to the interpretation of section 1199 of the Revised Statutes, Gen. Ansell on the one hand and on the other hand Gen. Crowder?

Secretary BAKER. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Gen. Ansell claiming that under that section 1199, there is in the Secretary and the Judge Advocate General the power to modify or to practically reverse the sentence of a court-martial?

Secretary BAKER. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Gen. Crowder, on the other hand, holding that his office has no power; that if the court had jurisdiction and if the trial was regular, no matter how many errors might have been committed, he has no power to reverse or modify it?

Secretary BAKER. Yes; I know that controversy.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You entertain the view of Gen. Crowder with reference to the power under that section of the Revised Statutes?

Secretary BAKER. Yes. Perhaps the committee would care to know just what took place in that particular instance.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. In this case?

Secretary BAKER. No; in general on that statute.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Secretary BAKER. Gen. Crowder was detailed to be Provost Marshal General, and at the time of his detail I rather reluctantly put him in charge of that work, because of my having come to rely very confidently upon his assistance and judgment as Judge Advocate General. He is one of the best lawyers I have ever been in contact with in a life of 25 years at the bar, and I rather reluctantly detailed him to the Provost Marshal General's Office, with the understanding that he would retain general supervision of the work of the Judge Advocate General's Office, and give it such attention as was necessary.

One day Gen. Ansell brought in to me, in my office, the first of his briefs on section 1199, and asked me to read it personally; said that it was on what he thought was a very important question, and one as to which I should express a personal judgment after I had read the whole argument. I read that brief two or three days after he brought it to me, and I then sent for Gen. Crowder. When the General came in I rather clumsily attempted a jesting or playful attitude with him. I said, "Gen. Crowder, how long have you been Judge Advocate General of the Army?" He told me the number of years. I said, "Is it possible that you have been Judge Advocate General for as many years as that, and have not discovered that there is a statute which gives the Judge Advocate General the power to reverse and modify court-martial proceedings?" The General took the question very seriously, and said that he did not think that that was a possible situation. I said, "Well, here is a brief which Gen. Ansell has handed me, and it is very persuasively written, for an interpretation of section 1199 of Revised Statutes which you have never called to my attention. I would like to have you take the brief, read it, and let me have your views." He took the brief, and subsequently handed me a written reply. That was sent to Gen. Ansell, as I recall, and he made a counter brief.

I examined the whole question then individually, personally going to the library of the Judge Advocate General's Office for my authorities, and decided the question. I decided that section 1199, by traditional interpretation, by settled construction, and by the decision of such courts as had passed upon it, did not have the meaning which Gen. Ansell ascribed to it. That decision, I feel quite certain, is unshakable so far as the legal question involved is concerned, and I appended to my decision a statement which I believe in very deeply, that in time of war the executive departments ought not to extend their powers by doubtful or new constructions of statutes which have a settled construction, but that a frank appeal to the legislature is the way to get new power, if new power is needed. I then instructed Gen. Crowder to prepare a bill which could be sent to the military affairs committees of the Senate and the House, which would give such additional power as might be necessary to correct these records. That bill was drawn, and I sent it to Senator Chamberlain and to Mr. Dent, with a letter urging its immediate consideration. The bill never was considered, of course, but that was the end of that dispute so far as I had anything to do with it.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The House took some evidence on it.

Secretary BAKER. Well, I did not recall that fact. It may be.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The Senate Committee on Military Affairs concluded not to act upon it. It was called to the attention of the committee. It was not ignored, but the committee declined to act. I do not know what discussions were had, but the theory of it was—at least my theory of the bill was—that it did not really afford any relief. It undertook to confer upon the President powers that he already had. The President, as the Commander in Chief of the Army, practically reversed the decision of the court below.

Secretary BAKER. No; he did not reverse it. He set it aside.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is practically the same thing.

Secretary BAKER. No; I do not think it is practically the same thing. It would have left the Department without a remedy to have set it aside.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. He set it aside because, as you say, the record was wholly insufficient to sustain such a conviction; or there was lack of record.

Secretary BAKER. In a vital matter.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. So that the President in the same way set it aside.

Secretary BAKER. There never has been any question of the power of the President to disapprove a court-martial proceeding in the class of cases which reach him.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. No.

Secretary BAKER. There never has been.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. So that the bill which you sent to the House and the Senate in January, 1918, did not confer any additional authority on the President, unless it gave him the power—and that, in the last analysis, would be the power of the Secretary of War and the Judge Advocate General—to examine into and to review all of the cases where there had been improper convictions.

Secretary BAKER. That “unless” is a very large unless.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; but he had that power before?

Secretary BAKER. No; I beg to differ from you, Senator. The President has always been conceded to have the power to disapprove the proceedings of a court-martial in certain classes of cases. Now, the bill which was sent and which did not receive the approval of the Congress speaks for itself. It is before the committee. It undertakes to give the President exactly the power which Gen. Ansell contended was in section 1199.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And in the Judge Advocate General's Department?

Secretary BAKER. And in the Judge Advocate General's Department.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; so that, in the last analysis, that bill which you sent up and which is in the record, practically left the power with the Judge Advocate General, because the President himself could not examine these infinite details of convictions?

Secretary BAKER. Oh, obviously, that is true.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you think the appellate power ought to remain within the Military Establishment itself?

Secretary BAKER. Yes; within the Military Establishment, supervised by the civil authority, which is the President, and the Secretary of War for him.

Senator, I have looked back over the list of my predecessors, from the beginning of this Government, and I find that they have been men of the most exalted character.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Nobody questions that.

Secretary BAKER. I looked back over the list of my recent predecessors, Mr. Garrison, Mr. Stimson, Mr. Taft, Mr. Root, Gen. Wright, Gen. Dickinson, Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Stanton, and the country has no more illustrious names.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Nobody questions that, Mr. Secretary.

Secretary BAKER. I looked back over the list of the Presidents, and I found the same element of exalted character, and the same confidence on the part of the public; and I can not persuade myself that any power intrusted to men of that type is improperly intrusted.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. There is no question about that, Mr. Secretary; but you know as a practical man, as well as I do, that it is a physical impossibility that the Secretary of War, with the numerous responsibilities that devolve upon him, should examine these cases in detail. Take your own case; it is a physical impossibility for you to examine and review minutely in detail all the cases that come up. He relies, and must rely, on his military advisers.

Secretary BAKER. Certainly.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. So that you do not question the integrity of the Secretary of War when you raise a question as to his ability to do things which it is physically impossible for him to do.

Secretary BAKER. Of course you raise a question which is really beside the issue. What the Secretary of War does is to select a Judge Advocate General whom he knows, and he watches that Judge Advocate General just as he watches any other subordinate. He learns to know how far he can rely on his discretion, his judgment, his industry, his knowledge, his sense of fairness; and when he finds that he has a subordinate upon whom he can not rely as to all those qualities, he replaces him with somebody upon whom he can rely.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What can be the objection to an appellate tribunal, partially civilian, if you please, or all civilian, if you please, but in the last analysis, having their judgments subject to reversal by the President? What objection can there be to a civilian tribunal to consider cases?

Secretary BAKER. The objections are practical and theoretical. I do not know enough to express a very positive opinion about the military difficulties, and yet I do think I know enough to illustrate the embarrassments. For instance, if you have a civilian tribunal, it has to sit somewhere, like the Supreme Court sits in Washington. Now, in France this kind of a case arose. We had a poor, misguided soldier who, under the influence of drink, or under some other maddening influence, raped a 4-year old French child, killed her, and secreted her body in an ash barrel. She was living with her grandparents. The guilt was obvious, unquestioned; finally admitted. That man was tried by court-martial, and the record of the case shows that it was faithfully and well tried; and he was hanged. Now, if that man had been sent out of the French village where that occurred to Washington or to some other place in the United States pending an appeal to a tribunal sitting over here, if the record of that case had been sent to Washington and a long delay had taken place between the offense and the punishment, the very agitated state of mind of the French village in which that crime took place would have made it certain that all sorts of rumors as to the escape of that man from the consequences of his act would have been circulated universally, and it is very difficult to tell what relations would have been developed between our Army and the French people among whom the soldiers were billeted.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. He was not brought before the local tribunal?

Secretary BAKER. No, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You would not have to remove him from the locus in quo?

Secretary BAKER. No, but then you would have had this situation, that you would have had to have him in the locus in quo for several months, or remove him to another place of imprisonment, in which case rumor on the subject would have been circulated everywhere that he had been sequestered or carried off so as to escape the consequences of his crime. What happened was that when that execution took place the word went all over France, spreading from those villagers everywhere, that our Army protected the civil population among whom they were stationed. While I do not believe in capital punishment, and while I have in public and in private opposed it as a matter of belief, I think that the effect of that execution was undoubtedly very powerful in reconciling the French civil population to the billeting of American soldiers in their villages.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes. That was an exceptional case, just as the cases of the four young men who were sentenced to be shot, in France, were exceptional cases. But there have been over 20,000 general court-martial cases and over 300,000 summary court cases.

Secretary BAKER. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. In practically none of which cases was any such crime as that concerned.

Secretary BAKER. Unfortunately there have been a large number of crimes similar to that. But what I am illustrating by that is not the particular crime, but the fact that when you have the Army in the field in places remote from our own country, you must make this military code so that it will fit the circumstances wherever they happen to be. We have soldiers in Siberia now, we have had them in northern Russia, and we may have them in Silesia. We have had them in Italy, where there was an inflamed state of the public mind, and all sorts of difficulties of reconciliation and conciliation.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you think in those cases the authorities here should lose touch with those men?

Secretary BAKER. Not at all; but I think we ought to build a system which is adapted to the task which the Army has to perform.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You, then, would not oppose any civil appellate tribunal?

Secretary BAKER. I would not approve a tribunal which could conclude the President. I think we have, in effect, a civil tribunal now.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The President?

Secretary BAKER. No. I think the boards of review which are appointed in the office of the Judge Advocate General and are composed in part of civilians—who are wearing the uniform, it is true, but are civilians with the civilian point of view—and military men, and in time of peace military men.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What is their power?

Secretary BAKER. Their power is to advise the Secretary of War.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; but that many regard as not a sufficient power.

Secretary BAKER. I believe it to be a sufficient power.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Of course, there is a difference of viewpoint. You may be right. That is the point we are trying to determine.

Secretary BAKER. I think it is a sufficient agency. My opinion is based upon two points: First, I have not found it to work badly; I think it works well. In the second place, if you have that agency in time of peace and are going to attempt to suspend it in time of war, as the French do, I think that the effect of such suspension on both soldiers and officers would be bad.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. But here is the trouble we have. Here is a man convicted by general court-martial, we will say, in the United States, and the evidence may or may not have been sufficient, or there may have been prejudicial error at the trial of that man. There may have been things occurred at the trial which in a civil tribunal would have caused a reversal of that decision; yet the man is convicted. The approving authority approves the judgment. In other words, that man then becomes a convict; he is convicted.

The case comes here to the Judge Advocate General and is referred by him to one of these reviewing boards you speak of. All in the world that this board can do and all in the world that the Secretary of War and the Judge Advocate General can do is to advise the exercising of clemency, or to advise a change in the judgment; but if the judgment is still maintained by the reviewing authority, the man is still a convict. There is no power to reverse for prejudicial error.

Secretary BAKER. I have no possible objection to the extension of the authority of the President so that it will reach down to reverse the authority of the convening authority if it conflicts with the Judge Advocate General. I believe that to make the Judge Advocate General superior in authority to the Commander in Chief is bad.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I will ask you this. You know. Are there not cases that are in the hands of the President that he has not been able to dispose of at all?

Secretary BAKER. Recently they have all been disposed of.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. How long were they there?

Secretary BAKER. They were there for six or eight weeks.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Are there not some that have been there over a year?

Secretary BAKER. I do not remember that there are any that have been there that long.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I think, if you will examine into it, you will find there are some. We lag behind the British authorities on the matter of court-martial proceedings. We have the same Articles of War, practically, with reference to courts-martial, that Great Britain had 100 years ago. But Great Britain has gotten away from it, and their reviewing authority is practically a civilian, according to Col. Rigby.

Secretary BAKER. But he has only advisory powers.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. But they practically do not differ from his views. The cases are very rare where they have departed from his views.

Secretary BAKER. They are relatively rare, but that is rather a tribute to the ability with which the trials are conducted than evidence of any authority on the part of the reviewing power.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Can you put into this record your objections to the authority of the Secretary of War with reference to this authority, whatever it is, below the President?

Secretary BAKER. I am perfectly willing to state them now. I believe that in time of emergency, concentration of command is entirely necessary for the discipline of the Army. I think that the Constitution recognizes that, by making the President Commander in Chief, and providing that discipline shall flow through the President to the Army. That is the first objection. The second is that I think, as Gen. Crowder gives me the figures, 88 per cent of the offenses tried by court-martial are military and not civil offenses, and that military men are better able to judge the facts and circumstances. They have more expert information as to what the significance of the facts is which are adduced in those trials, than civilians could possibly have. And in the third place, I am quite clear in my belief that any system built up for the Army ought to be adapted to the emergency uses of the Army as well as its peace-time needs, and that any necessity for an appellate tribunal remote from the field of action, with the consequent delay, is not adapted to the emergencies of actual, active field operations.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You feel that the judgments of courts-martial have been satisfactory and legal?

Secretary BAKER. That is, of course, a generalization that it would be dangerous to indulge. I do not think that any human agency works with invariable and unerring accuracy.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. In the main they have been?

Secretary BAKER. In the main they have been.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What was the use of these reviewing boards, if in the main the court-martial system has worked satisfactorily?

Secretary BAKER. I think the reviewing boards have served a very useful purpose, in readjusting and equalizing—particularly readjusting—the punishment. When a war is going on and you are in the stress of actual operations, the need of discipline is a very strong and urgent command upon everybody's conscience who is at work. When peace is reestablished it is possible to take a very much more lenient view of the penalties which have been imposed under actual war conditions. The whole system of justice in the Army, as Gen. Crowder, I feel sure, must have explained to you, is not punitive and is not exemplary, but is corrective, and I think the handsomest thing about the Army is the effort that it has made at Leavenworth and Alcatraz and Jay to bring about the rehabilitation of men who have been convicted of minor derelictions.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I quite agree with you.

Secretary BAKER. Now, when the armistice came it was possible to readjust the penalties imposed and bring them into harmony with the normal action of the Army's system of justice. Those boards served a very useful purpose.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is entirely at variance with the testimony of a number of officers here, with the Kernan report and the testimony of Gen. O'Ryan, all of whom have testified practically that the purpose of the system is to operate in terrorem; not to correct the faults of the men, but to set an example to others.

Secretary BAKER. I think that is natural and perhaps necessary while active operations are going on. I think the restraining influence during active operations is essential. Take those four death cases in France, which have been so much talked of, and so completely misunderstood.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I would be glad to have you give us an account of them.

Secretary BAKER. I would be very glad to. Take those four cases. The feeling on the part of Gen. Pershing, Gen. Bullard, and Gen. March was in no sense a savage feeling, a desire to bring about the execution of those young men; but each of those officers was acting under the most impelling sense of duty and of conscience. They had before them the experience of the Union armies in the Civil War, wherein, by reason of the leniency of President Lincoln, it was stated and believed by everybody that examined it, that very many more death sentences had ultimately to be executed because of the leniency of the President, which had broken down the discipline of the Army.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I would like to have you give the history of those cases as you understand it.

Secretary BAKER. I shall be glad to do so. Those four cases were brought into my office at one time, by Gen. March, among a large number of other papers. He said, in effect—I do not undertake to quote him exactly—"Mr. Secretary, here are the first death sentences from France. There are four of them, two for sleeping on outpost duty, and two for disobedience of orders. They were in Gen. Bullard's command. He was the convening authority, and he has recommended the execution of the death sentence in each of the cases. Gen. Pershing had the cases sent to his headquarters, and attached a very urgent recommendation to the department that the sentences should be carried out, in the interest of discipline. I have examined the cases, and I have attached my own recommendation that the sentences be carried out." I said, "Very well, General; leave them with me. I will examine them personally." I realized, of course, that being the first cases, they were important, and I undertook to examine the records.

A day or so later Gen. Crowder came in to see me, and he told me that he had agreed formally with the recommendation as to the execution of those sentences; that the records were legally sufficient; but that he was troubled about the question as to whether clemency ought not to be exercised. I said, "The cases are with me, Gen. Crowder, and nothing will be done about them until I have given them personal study." At that time I had not studied them.

Once or twice later, I do not remember how often, Gen. Crowder came in. I do not remember whether I sent for him or he came voluntarily, but each time he came we discussed generally the question of clemency in the cases, and finally I, as I recall it, took them to my house, and read the records very carefully. I discovered, first, the extreme youth of these boys. They divided them into two classes; first, the boys who slept on outpost duty. The boys who slept on outpost duty were mere children. They had fallen asleep as they stood in the front trench. Apparently they were still standing at the place where they were supposed to be on duty. They had not gone off and sat down or lain down, but as they stood up against the parapet with their guns in their hands, their heads had just nodded over and they were asleep. This showed that they were completely exhausted, that there was no cessation or intentional withdrawal from duty, but that tired nature had just reached its limit. In each of those cases the officer, a sergeant, had gone up to the boy and taken his gun away from him, and then had him roused and had him come to get his gun. But the striking thing about it was that they had not gone off and sat down or lain down. Having been in the trenches myself I realized how impossible it was for a man to sleep in the day time, with the noise of exploding shells and all the confusion of battle around him. Such conditions made it impossible for a man to get his natural rest. I came to the conclusion that in those cases it was simply an impossible thing to take those boys out and shoot them.

The other two cases were cases of disobedience of orders. By a singular circumstance, it appeared, I think I myself discovered that they were both members of a company which had been trained by an officer who had objected to going to Europe to fight, on the ground that he was of German extraction, and that he could not fight against his relatives. I may be telling you things that you already know.

Senator LENROOT. Was that the Henkes case?

Secretary BAKER. Yes. I discovered that those boys who disobeyed orders were trained in his company, and it seemed to me that boys of 18 or 19 years of age who had gotten their ideas of obedience from a captain who was himself in the state of mind that Henkes was in, could hardly have been held to have had as fair an opportunity to learn their obligations as if they had been under an officer who was not under that sort of stress. I sent for Gen. Crowder and called his attention to that fact, which up to that time, so far as I knew, he had not noted. He said he thought that was an important item. I did not disclose to Gen. Crowder or Gen. March or to anybody else what I proposed to do about those cases, but I studied them personally, and finally dictated and sent to the President a letter recommending that commutation should be had in all four cases.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I thought you said a while ago that you approved the sentences?

Secretary BAKER. I never said anything like that.

Senator LENROOT. He said Gen. March approved them.

Secretary BAKER. Gen. March formally approved.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I did not think that you had formally approved them, but—

Secretary BAKER. I never approved them for a minute; never had any idea of approving them; unless the circumstances turned out to be different from what I thought.

The fact is that the whole history of Mr. Lincoln's experience with the enforcement of the death penalty during the Civil War was familiar to me, and I had a general knowledge of the situation in foreign armies both in this and other wars.

These cases presented squarely an issue of the greatest gravity. When a man goes to sleep on outpost duty or refuses to obey a proper military order, he does not commit the same kind of offense as is involved in similar derelictions in civil life, or in the Army in peace times. A sleeping sentinel exposes his associates to terrible consequences, and if disobedience of orders is tolerated no one in a military command can know whether the things he is directed to do will be supported by the others to whom supporting orders are given, or whether he will be left bravely to obey and die while others disobey and cause his disaster. It was plainly necessary to use these first four cases in a way that would stir the Army and the men in it to a realization of their duty to one another and their duty to the country. As I thought the matter over, I came to the conclusion that in view of all the circumstances of these cases it would be possible for the President to commute the sentences, but to do it in an order which would inspire the Army with a fresh sense of devotion, and I therefore wrote to the President and at the same time wrote an order for his signature which, when published to the Army, would have the character of a direct message from the Commander in Chief, impressing every soldier with a new and earnest sense of responsibility.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Will you insert those letters in your testimony?

Secretary BAKER. They are in, somewhere; I do not happen to know where. If they are not, I shall be very glad to insert them.

(The letters referred to are as follows:)

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 1, 1918.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I present you herewith the court-martial proceedings in four cases occurring in the American Expeditionary Forces in France, each of which involves the imposition of the death penalty by shooting to death with musketry.

These cases have attracted widespread public interest, and with the papers are numerous letters and petitions urging clemency, most of which are of that spontaneous kind which are stirred by the natural aversion to the death penalty which humane people feel. Many of them are from mothers of soldiers whose general anxiety for the welfare of their sons is increased by apprehension lest exhaustion or thoughtlessness may lead their boys to weaknesses like those involved in these cases which the newspapers have described as trivial and involving no moral guilt, with the consequence that sons whose lives they are willing to forfeit in their country's defense may be ingloriously taken for disciplinary reasons in an excess of severity. Many of the letters are from serious and thoughtful men who argue that these cases do not involve disloyalty or conscious wrongdoing, and that whatever may have been the necessities of military discipline at other times and in other armies, the progress of a humane and intelligent civilization among us has advanced us beyond the helpful exercise of so stern a discipline in our Army in the present war.

I examined these cases personally, and had reached a conclusion with regard to the advice which I am herein giving before I had seen any of the letters or criticisms.

The record discloses the fact that the divisional commander, the commander in chief, Gen. Pershing, the Chief of Staff, Gen. March, and the Judge Advocate General concur in recommending the execution of the penalties imposed. The Judge Advocate General limits his concurrence to the technical statement that the proceedings in the cases are regular, and expressing regret that a more adequate conduct of the defense of the several men concerned was not provided, concurs in the recommendation of Gen. Pershing. As I find myself reaching an entirely different conclusion, and disagreeing with the entire and authoritative military opinion in case, I beg leave to set out at some length the reasons which move me in the matter.

The cases must be divided into two classes, and I will deal, first, with the two young men convicted of sleeping while on duty, namely, Pvt. Jeff Cook and Pvt. Forest D. Sebastian, both in Company G, Sixteenth Infantry.

These cases are substantially identical in their facts. The accusations were laid under the eighty-sixth article of war, which reads:

"Any sentinel who is found * * * sleeping upon his post * * * shall, if the offense be committed in time of war, suffer death or such other punishment as a court-martial may direct."

In both cases a corporal inspecting along a front line trench found these young men standing in the proper military position, leaning against the trench, with their rifles lying on the parapet of the trench within easy reach of their hands. Each man had his head resting on his arm, and his arm resting on the parapet. The offenses were committed, in the Sebastian case on the night of November 3 and 4, and in the Cook case on or about the 5th of November. In both cases the testimony was exceedingly brief, and showed that the night was dark and cold, that the soldiers had their ponchos and other equipment on, and in one case it was a fair inference that the poncho was drawn over the ears and trench helmet in such a way as to make it difficult for the soldier to hear the approaching steps of the corporal. In each case the corporal laid his own rifle upon the parapet and took that of the soldier, carrying it away with him, and instructed the other sentinel, the men being posted in this outpost duty in twos, to shake the soldier and tell him to report to the corporal for his gun. In each case the corporal shamed the soldier for his neglect of duty, and pointed out to him the fact that not only his own life but those of others were at stake, and that he should be more zealous and alert. In neither case does either the corporal or the fellow-sentinel swear positively that the accused was asleep; I confess that on all reasonable grounds, taking the circumstances into consideration it seems to me entirely likely that both men were asleep; but it is important to note that in neither case had the accused stepped away from his proper military post to sit down or lie down; both being found standing at their post of duty in what is admitted to have been a correct military position, and if they were asleep their heads literally nodded over on to their arms without any intentional relaxation of attention to their duty so far as can be gathered from any of the surrounding circumstances.

These soldiers are both young. Sebastian enlisted into the Regular Army by volunteering on the 18th of April, 1917, having had no previous military experience, his age at that time being 19 years and 6 months. He was, therefore, slightly more than 20 at the time of the alleged offense. Cook enlisted on the 11th of May, 1917, without previous military experience, his age at that time being 18 years and 11 months. He was, therefore, at the time of the alleged offense, slightly under 20 years of age.

From the testimony, it appears that both of these young men had been posted as sentinels doing what is called double sentry duty, going on duty at 4 p. m., and remaining on duty until 6 a. m., with relief at intervals by other sentinels during the night, but with no opportunity to sleep during the night because of there being no place where they could secure sleep. It further appeared that neither of them had slept during the day before after having spent the previous night on gas sentinel duty, although both had tried to sleep during the day preceding the night of the alleged offenses but found it impossible because of the noise. In both cases the commanding officers of the soldiers who forwarded the charges and recommended trials by general courts-martial added to his endorsement as extenuating circumstances the youth and failure of the soldiers to take the necessary rest when off duty on the first occupation of trenches.

It is difficult to picture to the eye which has not seen it the situation in which these young soldiers were placed. In the month of November the section of France in which these soldiers were stationed was cold, wet and uncomfortable in the extreme. No sort of shelter of any comfortable kind could be provided near the trenches, because it attracts enemy observation and fire. Throughout one long night they performed duty as gas sentinels, during the next day, when they perhaps ought to have sought more rest than they did seek, they found it difficult to secure any sleep because of the noise and discomfort of their surroundings. As a consequence on the night of the alleged offenses they had reached the place at which exhausted nature apparently refused to go further, and without any intentional relaxation of vigilance on their parts they dozed in standing positions at their posts of duty.

I am quite aware of the gravity of this offense, and of the fact that the safety of others, perhaps the safety of an army and of a cause, may depend upon such disciplinary enforcement of this regulation as will prevent soldiers from sleeping on sentinel duty; and yet I cannot believe that youths of so little military experience, placed for the first time under circumstances so exhausting can be held to deserve the death penalty, nor can I believe that discipline of the death sentence ought to be imposed in cases which do not involve a bad heart, or so flagrant a disregard of the welfare of others, and of the obligation of a soldier as to be evidence of conscious disloyalty.

In both of these cases the reviewing judge advocate quotes with approval some observations of Gen. Upton who in his work on military policy points out that action taken by President Lincoln in the early days of the Civil War pardoning or commuting sentences in cases of death penalty led to the need of greater severity at a later period in the interest of discipline; but the cases which Gen. Upton had in mind were cases of desertion in the face of the enemy involving cowardice, and cases of substantially treasonable betrayal of the nation, and I can see no persuasion in them as an example. Rather it would seem to indicate that the invocation of this opinion of Gen. Upton indicates a feeling on the part of the reviewing judge advocate that while these particular cases might not be deemed on their own merits to justify the death sentence, that, nevertheless, as a disciplinary example such action would be justified. I am not, of course, suggesting that any of the military officers who have reviewed these cases would be willing to sacrifice the lives of these soldiers even though innocent; but I do think that if these cases stood alone no one of the reviewing officers would have recommended the execution of these sentences; their recommendations being, in my judgment, soldierly and in accordance with the traditions of their profession, and based upon a very earnest desire on their part to save the safety of their commands, and the lives of other soldiers; but, nevertheless, to some extent influenced by the value to the discipline of the army of the examples which their execution would afford.

I have not sought to examine the learning of this subject, and, therefore, have not prepared a history of the death penalty as a military punishment; but I think it fair to assume that it arose in times and under circumstances quite different from these, when men were impressed into armies to fight for causes in which they had little interest and of which they had little knowledge, and when their conduct was controlled without their consent by those who assumed to have more or less arbitrary power over them. Our Army, however, is the army of a democratic Nation fighting for a cause which the people themselves understand and approve, and I had happy and abundant evidence when I was in France that the plain soldiers of our expeditionary forces are aware of the fact that they are really defending principles in which they have as direct an interest as anybody, principles which they understand, approve, and are willing to die for.

I venture, therefore, to believe that the President can with perfect safety to military discipline pardon these two young men; and I have prepared and attached hereto an order which, if it meets with your approval, will accomplish that purpose, and at the same time, I believe, upon its publication further stimulate the already fine spirit of our Army in France. Such an order as I have here drawn would be read by every soldier in France and in the United States, and coming from the Commander in Chief would be a challenge to the performance of duty, quite as stimulating as any disciplinary terror proceeding from the execution of these sentences. In the meantime, public opinion in this country would, I believe, with practical unanimity approve such action on your part.

In the cases of Stanley G. Fishback and Olon Ledoyen, the charges are substantially identical in that each of them is accused under the sixty-fourth article of war of having "Willfully disobeyed any lawful command of his superior officer." The facts show that on the 3d day of January, 1918, these two young men in broad day light in the theater of war, at a place back of the actual line, were directed to bring their equipment and fall in for drill. Each refused, whereupon they were warned by the lieutenant who gave the order not to persist in their refusal on the ground that grave consequences would ensue. They were not warned that the penalty of disobedience was death; but were advised earnestly to comply. Both persisted in their refusal. Each gave as his reason for refusing that he had been drilled extensively the day before, that they had gotten cold, the weather being extremely severe, and that they had not yet recovered from the effects of that exposure.

Both pleaded guilty at the trial.

It is perfectly obvious that this order ought to have been obeyed. It was a proper military order, and it seems to me inconceivable that such obstinate refusal on so trivial a matter could have been made with any consciousness that the death penalty was the alternative. Nevertheless, the disobedience was willful, undisciplined, and inexcusable, and it ought to be punished with a suitable punishment.

The Judge Advocate General in reviewing these cases limits himself again to the technical correctness of the proceedings; but in a subsequent memorandum he called the attention of the Chief of Staff to the fact that four cases of sleeping on post arising in the same regiment at approximately the same time resulting in acquittal of the accused on substantially the same evidence as that recited in the Sebastian and Cook cases above reviewed, and that in six cases similar offenses committed elsewhere in France had led to very moderate penalties. The Judge Advocate General says in this memorandum:

"In addition to the foregoing, the study in this office reveals a number of cases which have come in from France where men have been convicted of willful disobedience of orders under circumstances which do not distinguish them as to the locus of the offense from the cases of Fishback and Ledoyen, who were sentenced to death. The sentences in the cases referred to run from a few months to several years' confinement."

In other words, the Judge Advocate General reviewing generally the state of discipline in the Army in France, and the steps taken to enforce it, reaches the conclusion that up to the time of the trial of these cases the offenses of which these soldiers were convicted had been regarded as quite minor in their gravity. The Chief of Staff in commenting upon this memorandum of the Judge Advocate General is able from his own recollection to add that the willful disobedience cases lately tried in France did not occur in the actual theater of war, making at least that much of a distinction. But the case still remains one in which suddenly a new and severe attitude is taken without the record disclosing that any special order had been made notifying soldiers that the requirements of discipline would call upon courts-martial thereafter to resort to extreme penalties to restore discipline.

Both Ledoyen and Fishback are young. The record shows that Ledoyen enlisted on the 3d of February, 1917, without previous military experience, his age at that time being 18 years and 1 month. Fishback enlisted on the 17th of February, 1917, without previous military experience, his age being 19 years and 2 months. Each of them at the time of the commission of the alleged offenses was, therefore, less than 20 years of age.

The record in the Fishback case shows that there had been previous shortcomings on his part in the matter of obedience. That is to say, he had once failed to report for drill for which he was required to forfeit 15 days' pay; a second time failed to report for drill, penalty not stated; and a third time failed to report for fatigue duty, for which he was sentenced to one month at hard labor and to forfeit two-thirds of his pay for two months. He seems, therefore, to have found it difficult to accommodate himself to the discipline of the life of a soldier, and his offense hereunder reviewed is aggravated by this previous record.

By a very extraordinary coincidence this record discloses the fact that these two soldiers were members of a company commanded by Capt. D. A. Henckes. It is from the captain of his company that the soldier most immediately learns discipline and obedience. The captain sets the example, and inculcates the principles upon which the soldier is built. Now, this particular Capt. Henckes, although for many years an officer in the Regular Army, was himself so undisciplined and disloyal that when he was ordered to France with his command, he sought to resign because he did not want to fight the Germans. Born in this country, and for 20 years an officer in its Army, under sworn obligation to defend the United States against all her enemies, domestic and foreign, he still sought to resign; and when the resignation was not accepted, and he went to France, the commander in chief was obliged to return him to this country because of his improper attitude toward the military service, and his country's cause in this war. He was thereupon court-martialed, and is now serving a sentence of 25 years in the penitentiary for his lack of loyalty and lack of discipline.

I confess I do not see how any soldiers in his company could have been expected to learn the proper attitude toward the military service from such a commander. I do not suggest that the shortcomings of Capt. Henckes be made an excuse for their disobedience, but these mere youths can hardly be put to death under these circumstances, and I, therefore, recommend that the sentence in each case be commuted to one involving penal servitude under circumstances which will enable them by confinement in the Disciplinary Barracks at Fort Leavenworth to acquire under better conditions a wholesome attitude toward the duty of a soldier. Orders accompanying this letter are drawn for your approval which will carry out the recommendation here made.

In view of the fact that both Fishback and Ledoyen had been previously guilty of minor offenses as disclosed by the record the penalty suggested is three years' confinement.

Respectfully submitted.

NEWTON D. BAKER, Secretary of War.

---

In the foregoing case of Pvt. Forest D. Sebastian, Company G, Sixteenth Infantry, sentence is confirmed.

In view of the youth of Pvt. Sebastian, and the fact that his offense seems to have been wholly free from disloyalty or conscious disregard of his duty, I hereby grant him a full and unconditional pardon, and direct that he report to his company for further military duty.

The needs of discipline in the Army with propriety impose grave penalties upon those who imperil the safety of their fellows, and endanger their country's cause by lack of vigilance, or by infractions of rules in which safety has been found to rest. I am persuaded, however, that this young man will take the restored opportunity of his forfeited life as a challenge to devoted service for the future, and that the soldiers of the Army of the United States in France will realize too keenly the high character of the cause for which they are fighting, and the confidence which their country reposes in them to permit the possibility of further danger from any similar shortcoming.

In the foregoing case of Pvt. Jeff Cook, Company G, Sixteenth Infantry, sentence is confirmed.

In view of the youth of Pvt. Cook, and the fact that his offense seems to have been wholly free from disloyalty or conscious disregard of his duty, I hereby grant him a full and unconditional pardon, and direct that he report to his company for further military duty.

The needs of discipline in the Army with propriety impose grave penalties upon those who imperil the safety of their fellows, and endanger their country's cause by lack of vigilance, or by infractions of rules in which safety has been found to rest. The WHITE HOUSE, May, 1918.

Secretary BAKER. The President wrote me a note soon after, thanking me for the attention with which I had scrutinized the cases, saying that he would be very glad to follow my advice about it. Now, that is the whole history of those cases. I never heard, until Gen. Ansell wrote a letter to some Member of the lower House of Congress, that he had had anything to do with that at all. Gen. Ansell's statement that it was necessary for him to bestir himself to prevent execution of those sentences has no basis whatever in fact. He may have bestirred himself, but my action was without the least knowledge of any opinion or action of his.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you know whether or not any Member of the House saw the President about these four cases before your letter to the President?

Secretary BAKER. I have no means of knowing that; but I know that the President never communicated to me that he had been seen by anybody about it, and the first talk I had with the President about it was when I sent him my recommendation of commutation.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. In looking over those records, did it strike you that these young men—I think all four of them—had not had the proper defense interposed for them?

Secretary BAKER. The records legally are conclusive of the actual guilt of the four.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. They are bound to be, because two of them, at least, plead guilty.

Secretary BAKER. I am not certain. I think all four of them did. Two of them did, at least.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. So that the records are legally sufficient, but there was not submitted to the trial court the fact of the environment of these young men, and of their having been on duty for a long time, or the circumstances.

Secretary BAKER. Yes; it appeared in the record that they had been unable to sleep the night before, and the surroundings were all shown. Of course they were perfectly known to the court. The trial was at the front where knowledge of conditions was general.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Was it explained by counsel in these trials that with a plea of guilty they might be sentenced to death?

Secretary BAKER. I think so. If that was not so, it would have been a defect, because the law requires it.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you think they were old enough to understand the seriousness of the offense?

Secretary BAKER. Oh, yes; they were quite old enough for that.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The military authorities all recommended the execution of the sentence, officially?

Secretary BAKER. So far as I know, without exception.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. There have been only about 25 executions over there, have there not, and here?

Secretary BAKER. There have been no executions for military offenses during this war.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. None at all?

Secretary BAKER. None.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You wrote a letter to the President some time ago stating the subsequent history of two of these boys?

Secretary BAKER. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. One of them was killed in actual battle, and one of them was wounded. What became of the other two?

Secretary BAKER. The other two, the commutations were not complete commutations, as there was perfectly obvious disobedience of orders. In their case there was commutation to two or three years at Fort Leavenworth.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you know whether they are out now?

Secretary BAKER. I do not know whether they are still at Fort Leavenworth or whether they have been released.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. One of those boys was killed in action and the other was wounded in one fight and recovered and went back and was wounded in a second action; so that they did possess that soldierly quality, notwithstanding their breach of duty?

Secretary BAKER. Undoubtedly.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you think it would be feasible or advisable for Congress to enact a law which would make one or two, or possibly a majority, of a court that in the last analysis would be subject to the Commander in Chief of the Army, to constitute an appellate tribunal to review these cases of general courts-martial, or possibly others, to ascertain whether or not there has been prejudicial errors and make their recommendations?

Secretary BAKER. Perfectly feasible.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What do you think would be the result?

Secretary BAKER. I do not think it would improve the present review.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. If you had heard some of the testimony here—I do not know how much you know of it—you would have ascertained that, I think, the statement has been made by some one, and possibly by you, inferentially, that while Gen. Crowder's heart appealed against the execution of the sentences, he finally recommended it. Is there not a disposition upon the part of the military authorities to stand together on cases of that kind?

Secretary BAKER. I think not. I have never discovered it.

Senator, those death cases presented as difficult a question of discretion and judgment as any cases I have ever faced in my life. The whole history of the war was standing there to be looked at. Every man who has exercised clemency in cases like that has realized, and must realize, that when he does it he is possibly exposing large numbers of other people to very serious consequences.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; that may be true; but I think there is a very distinguished Member of the Senate at this time who was caught sleeping at his post and his commanding officer took his gun away from him, but he was not sentenced to be hung.

Secretary BAKER. Yes; and that is a very happy and fortunate circumstance, and I have not the least idea that there was ever any untoward circumstance followed from it. I think of Lincoln with an aching heart. Mr. Lincoln, when he first began to deal with death sentences, could not sentence men to death who had fought in the Army of the country, and after he had commuted a large number of those sentences, the number of desertions and of derelictions of duty was such as to imperil the safety of the Union Army, and he had finally to yield.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; but Mr. Lincoln's kindness and tenderness with his men was not what the military authorities advised. That is what I am getting at. This is taking some of these cases absolutely out of the jurisdiction of the military authorities, where trial had been had and there were errors at the trial—prejudicial errors.

Secretary BAKER. I have already expressed my entire sympathy with your plan to make prejudicial error the basis for a reversal of the judgment by the President.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you think that if that proposed amendment of January, 1918, was embodied in the law, that is all the articles need to be amended?

Secretary BAKER. I would not say that. I think if that had been embodied in the law it would have given the President the power to reverse, modify, or affirm, and I think that would have accomplished the purpose which you now have in mind by a court of review.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What additional power would that have given to the President over the amount he has now—over what he exercises?

Secretary BAKER. It would have given him the power to reverse the findings and have a trial de novo.

Senator LENROOT. Do you feel quite clear on that?

Secretary BAKER. That is what I hope it would do. That is what I think it ought to do.

Senator LENROOT. I have it before me here. It is on page 108 of this record. I read from page 108, as follows:

The President may * * * return any record through the reviewing authority to the court for reconsideration or correction.

That does not carry, to my mind, the idea of a new trial.

Secretary BAKER. Just above that it says:

* * * the President shall have power to disapprove, vacate, or set aside any finding, in whole or in part, to modify, vacate, or set aside any sentence, in whole or in part, and to direct the execution of such part only of any sentence as has not been vacated or set aside.

Senator LENROOT. Now, just follow on there a little further.

Secretary BAKER (reading):

The President may suspend the execution of sentences in such classes of cases as may be designated by him, until acted upon as herein provided, and may return any record through the reviewing authority to the court for reconsideration or correction.

Senator LENROOT. That does not imply trial of the case de novo.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. Secretary, the possible wrong that might be perpetrated by the military authorities when no appeal is had, or there is no power on the part of the appellate tribunal to reverse or modify the judgment of the court below, was exemplified in the cases of those negroes who were convicted in Texas, was it not?

Secretary BAKER. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. In that case those men were sentenced to be executed and were excuted before the record of their conviction reached the War Department?

Secretary BAKER. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And within 48 hours after conviction?

Secretary BAKER. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That led the War Department to the adoption of General Order No. 7, did it not?

Secretary BAKER. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. But for that order which was issued, and which was suggested by the hardship in that particular case, these boys in France might have been executed without the record ever reaching Washington?

Secretary BAKER. That would not have been possible, since the commander in the field did not have authority to execute the death sentence for sleeping on post or disobedience of orders without referring the case to Washington. There are three classes of court-martial cases—first, those in which the President is the convening authority; second, those in which the President is the confirming authority; and third, those in which a commander subordinate to the President is the convening authority.

With regard to the first of these, no instance arose in this war. The second class includes all death and dismissal cases, except only death sentences in case of murder, rape, mutiny, desertion in time of war, and spying. In crimes of the latter class, the commanding general or department commander may execute the death sentence without reference to the President; but the four death sentences under consideration were not within the excepted classes and therefore were of necessity referred to the President as the confirming authority. The third class of cases above referred to, in which the commander subordinate to the President is the convening authority, represents 98 per cent of the cases. As to them the President has no function, except that where there is jurisdictional error he may set aside the whole proceedings.

General Order No. 7 directed the submission to the President of all death, dismissal, and dishonorable discharge cases, with certain exceptions in the actual theater of war. There was no defect of power to issue this order, though there may have been a defect of foresight.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Well, you say there was no defect of power?

Secretary BAKER. That there was no appeal. But General Order No. 7, of course, accomplished a complete remedy.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It suspended the execution until the reviewing authority here could look at the record?

Secretary BAKER. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That was the substance of it?

Secretary BAKER. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And the records of all death sentences reached here?

Secretary BAKER. All death sentences and dismissals.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That was not because of any action of any reviewing authority, but because of a general order issued by the War Department?

Secretary BAKER. It was a general order issued by the War Department on the recommendation of the Judge Advocate General.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Why was that necessary?

Secretary BAKER. I do not know that I understand you.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Why was it necessary to issue that order? Why did you issue that order?

Secretary BAKER. In order to afford the reviewing authority opportunity to submit them to the Secretary of War.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Therefore probably the judgment of conviction in those Texas cases would have afforded opportunity for the reviewing authority to have the execution of those men in Texas sustained or revoked?

Secretary BAKER. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Now, Mr. Secretary, if the purpose of the judgments of courts-martial was corrective only, as you have indicated, why have you found it proper or necessary to create these reviewing boards, and why have you found it necessary to exercise clemency in so many cases?

Secretary BAKER. Our Army, Senator Chamberlain, was made up of 4,000,000 men, of whom a very large number came from civil life, both men and officers. They had had little or no previous military experience, and they were under a very strong sense of the necessity of whipping the Army quickly into a highly efficient condition. The army they were creating was to meet the most highly trained and disciplined body of men in the world. As a consequence, the training our men received was intensively real; both officers and men felt that this was no idle practice or moot court exercise, and both in our training camps at home and in the training abroad men acted under the pressure of a great responsibility. They were preparing their organizations to function in battle and had no opportunity to give the long drawn-out demonstrations of the value of discipline which peace-time training affords, but in a very real sense felt obliged to assert and maintain a rigid discipline. As a result, many of the cases of dereliction of duty which under peace-time conditions would have been merely the basis of admonition and counsel were in fact made the basis of charges, and long-term sentences were imposed in order that they might impress upon the men who learned of them the necessity for discipline. In most of the cases in which such long-term sentences were imposed death sentences might have been imposed; but clearly this new army, judging itself and molding itself for its great task, sought to get its discipline by long-term prison sentences rather than by the frequent imposition of the death penalty.

The sentences imposed in this fashion throughout the Army varied very widely. In some organizations there were more emergency officers than in others. The circumstances under which particular derelictions of duty took place differed widely; no settled disciplinary policy had time to assert itself throughout so widespread and large a group of military units. The consequence was that these sentences represented a very unequal imposition of penalties and, undoubtedly, represented in many instances a variety of judgment which was in part due to inexperience and in part to the excitement and earnestness which knowledge of the character of this war instilled into all of those who were preparing to take their part in it.

Now, when the war was over, it was possible to survey the whole situation. There was no longer occasion to inspire other people with the fear of serious penalties, and so the boards of review undertook carefully to balance and equalize the judgment of the penalties which had been imposed by the undisciplined army. I think the boards were absolutely necessary and that they have fully accomplished the purpose which it was necessary to have them accomplish.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Where did you find authority for the creation of those boards?

Secretary BAKER. The authority undoubtedly lies in the Judge Advocate General's power. In the last analysis, the boards have no power but to advise the Judge Advocate General, and the Judge Advocate General advises the Secretary of War. The boards are created simply in the ordinary organization of the Judge Advocate General's Office.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I do not disapprove of the exercise of clemency on behalf of these men now. I heartily approve of it. But I am wondering why it was necessary, if the judgments in the first instance were corrective merely.

Secretary BAKER. I think it would be wrong to say that the judgments were corrective merely. I did not mean to be so understood. What I said was that the theory of the Army administration of justice, the fundamental theory of it as evidenced by what happens when men are sent to Fort Leavenworth, is correction and not punishment. Now, undoubtedly, while this war was going on a great many very severe penalties were imposed of an exemplary character for the purpose of dissuading other people from doing the things that had brought these men into difficulties. That was undoubtedly true as to conscientious objectors; undoubtedly the court-martial sentences passed in the conscientious-objector cases were to make persons who might be disposed to take refuge in pretended conscientious objection feel that that was not a safe refuge.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Then, do you agree with Gen. O'Ryan that they were in terrorem?

Secretary BAKER. I think many of them were, while the war was on, and I think there was need for the example. But I think there was need, after the war, for the work of the reviewing boards.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you know how many are now in prison for military offenses?

Secretary BAKER. I do not know how many. Gen. Kreger gave that to you. He gave that in his testimony here.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You know Gen. Crowder promised when this thing came up in February that there would be a general jail delivery within 60 days.

Secretary BAKER. I did not know that he quite promised that. As I understood, he said that all the cases would have been reviewed within 60 days.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; I think that is what he said.

Secretary BAKER. I did not know that he promised a general jail delivery.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. He said in this February hearing, in answer to a question of Senator McKellar, as follows, on page 271 [reading]:

Gen. CROWDER. Now, addressing myself to the elements of that briefly, I want to say that before 30 days I shall have 60 per cent, or may be 70 per cent. of these sentences remitted in their excessive portions; and within 60 days I hope to have the whole field cleared up, so that you need not consider the question of punishment. That is the order. They will be worked out very expeditiously. So there remains to be considered only this question of removing the stigma of conviction.

Now, we do not remove the stigma of conviction by any action of these boards.

Secretary BAKER. Yes; I think that is true.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. So that a man may have been unjustly convicted and sentenced, and the action of this board does not remove that.

Secretary BAKER. I think you are confusing two things. Sentence to excessive punishment and unjust conviction are two entirely different things.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. They are pretty closely associated.

Secretary BAKER. They are not even first cousins, as I see it. Where a man is unjustly convicted, this stigma of conviction does attach to him until he is either pardoned or the conviction is disapproved. But where a man is legally, properly found guilty and the judgment of the tribunal errs only in the quantity of the sentence imposed, clemency is a proper remedy.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That may be, but if all these sentences of these courts are correctly imposed, why should clemency be exercised at all?

Secretary BAKER. I do not contend that the sentences imposed upon these military prisoners were proper sentences to be served. Nobody ever supposed that they would be served.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I can not understand why anybody should understand that they would not be served, where the thing was approved by the military authorities.

Secretary BAKER. Everybody who knew the system of discipline in the Army knew by token of past experience, and by the settled practice in the Army, that a long-term sentence to Fort Leavenworth is an indeterminate sentence, and that its termination depends on the good behavior and corrigibility of the prisoner.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you know how many conscientious objectors there are still in prison?

Secretary BAKER. I do not know. Perhaps 70, or 80 of those that are classed as conscientious objectors; although that is an exceedingly misleading phrase. It includes the religious objector and the political objector, the anarchist and revolutionist. All are equally "conscientious objectors."

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Clemency was exercised in behalf of how many?

Secretary BAKER. I have not the figures, but I think originally there were something over 500 men in prison who were generically grouped as conscientious objectors. Clemency was exercised in behalf of most of them, I think.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. None of them performed any military service?

Secretary BAKER. Well, none of them performed military service; there may have been some of them that went into the disciplinary battalion afterwards, although I am not certain of that.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. When they were released were they given the pay of soldiers from the time they were drafted into the service up to the time they were discharged?

Secretary BAKER. My impression is that the local judge advocate's office determined first that they were entitled to their pay, and many of them were paid; and a large number of them sent the checks back to me to reimburse the Government, and the checks were turned over to the Treasury Department.

Senator LENROOT. Are they given a discharge?

Secretary BAKER. Some of them. It is a discharge that is not honorable or dishonorable. It is a peculiar discharge, certifying simply that the soldier is discharged from the Army and has performed no military service.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It is a yellow ticket?

Secretary BAKER. I do not know the color.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I believe that is all.

Senator LENROOT. Mr. Secretary, with reference to the present practice, are disapprovals made wherever prejudicial error is found by the reviewing authority?

Secretary BAKER. You mean in the action of the Secretary of War and the President?

Senator LENROOT. Beginning with the first reviewing authority—that is, the convening authority—is it the practice to set aside—or disapprove, rather—the findings wherever prejudicial error is found?

Secretary BAKER. Senator, I can not answer that. I can only say that I have inquired a number of times of Gen. Crowder and Gen. Kreger, and my best recollection is that in their judgment commanding officers, convening authorities, almost invariably follow the advice of the Judge Advocate General's Office. I think I have been told there were two or three instances of their adhering to their view when there was a difference of opinion, when their own departmental or division judge advocate was very strong, and they preferred to follow their own judge advocate. I think there were only two or three cases.

So far as my own action is concerned, my recollection of the figures is that there were 8 or 10 cases in which I declined to follow the Judge Advocate General's advice. It was not, however, upon questions of the existence of prejudicial error, but it was largely upon questions of clemency. I took the view in this war that a drunken officer was an intolerable thing; that so far as I was personally concerned, I could not take the responsibility of sending anybody else's son into battle under an officer who had so far forgotten the requirements of his place as to become drunk while an officer; and while, in civil life, I was perfectly willing to give a man a second chance on that failing, that where it involved the lives of other men I could not have some officer break down in the middle of the battle and be found drunk and his men leaderless, if he had previously shown his susceptibility to the weakness. So that in three or four cases where the Judge Advocate General's Office recommended that, although the proof of drunkenness was clear, it was a first offense and therefore a reprimand or something of that kind would be sufficient, I declined to agree with that and adhered to the finding of the court for that reason. I do not recall ever having disagreed with the Judge Advocate General's recommendation upon any other class of cases, although there may have been one or two.

Senator LENROOT. And wherever you, yourself, were of the opinion that prejudicial error existed, you recommended the disapproval of the finding?

Secretary BAKER. Oh, clearly.

Senator LENROOT. Did you apply the same rule to prejudicial error as would be applied in a civil court?

Secretary BAKER. So far as I know, the rule is identical.

Senator LENROOT. For instance, take a case of this kind—and I am not giving an actual case but merely a hypothetical case—of evidence being admitted of other offenses than that charged. The evidence aside from the testimony might in itself be sufficient to sustain the verdict, and yet that would be prejudicial error in a civil court. Would you so regard it in a case of this sort?

Secretary BAKER. I would follow the established rules on that question, which are that previous offenses which show a disposition to commit the particular offense are admissible.

Senator LENROOT. No; I did not mean that. I meant where it would be reversible error in a civil court.

Secretary BAKER. Oh, clearly.

Senator LENROOT. Now, with reference to this court of appeals——

Secretary BAKER. Senator, to amplify my answer to your question, I can say this, that every review which comes before me from the Judge Advocate General's Office of a conviction, contains an appeal to the law books. The Supreme Court of the United States and the Federal courts and the State courts are all cited on questions of evidence.

Senator LENROOT. Now, with relation to the establishment of this court of military appeal, aside from the question, if such a court is created, of how should it be created, there seem to be two principal objections that have been urged, and you have spoken of both of them this morning, I think; one of them, the dangers of delay in time of war; and secondly, which has been more emphasized by other witnesses, the seeming incongruity of a subordinate officer controlling the actions of his superiors.

With reference to the latter objection, I take it for granted that it is assumed that in the creation of such a court it would be clothed with the same powers that a reviewing authority now has in making that objection.

Secretary BAKER. I should think so.

Senator LENROOT. But if the jurisdiction of that reviewing authority was limited to passing upon questions of law—the ascertainment of prejudicial error—would that objection still hold?

Secretary BAKER. I think the objection would still hold. It does not seem to me to be very important, in time of peace. I can not imagine anybody having the slightest objection to it in time of peace.

Senator LENROOT. If an appeal were allowed direct from the court-martial to such a court, and the jurisdiction of the court limited to these questions of law, its duty being, if reversible or prejudicial error was found, to transmit the record to the convening authority for a new trial, or if such error was not found, to transmit the record to the confirming authority for further action, could there be any possible objection from the standpoint of controlling superior authority?

Secretary BAKER. None; and in time of peace it would be a most desirable arrangement.

Senator LENROOT. You would approve of that?

Secretary BAKER. Yes; I can see no objection to that. Of course I think we are a little misled by our talking of "civilians" and "military men," because the people in the Judge Advocate General's Office are all civilians, as a matter of fact. There are very few of them who have had much military experience, and when we have appointed men in the Judge Advocate General's Office, the thing that my predecessors have always done, and I have always done, is to search among civilian lawyers until we found a man of satisfactory ability, with actual legal experience. We examine their qualifications very closely, and we get excellent material. The men in the Judge Advocate General's Office are a very high type of lawyers, both those temporarily in the service and those who are permanently there. I have been associating with lawyers all my life, and it has been a great inspiration to me to see the thoroughness and the lawyer-like way in which those men treat their profession.

Senator LENROOT. In reference to the constitution of such a court, if it were created, even though a majority were composed of military men of the Regular Establishment, if they were appointed for definite times, in the first place they would naturally be selected because of their special qualifications?

Secretary BAKER. Undoubtedly.

Senator LENROOT. And in the second place, their devoting their entire time for a given period would tend to make them specially qualified, would it not?

Secretary BAKER. Undoubtedly.

Senator LENROOT. So that even though a majority of the court was composed of military men, such a court would be much better qualified to pass upon those questions than the reviewing authority now—for instance, the convening authority?

Secretary BAKER. I think such a court, whether a committee of the Judge Advocate General's Office or another tribunal created by some other legislation, would undoubtedly bring to bear upon a record a higher degree of skill than can be looked for from convening authorities acting upon the record.

Senator LENROOT. You would say, would you not, Mr. Secretary, that unless pressing necessity exists for reposing authority in the President or somebody who may not be qualified to pass upon the law, or who, because of his other duties, finds it physically impossible for him to give his consideration to the cases individually, it would be very much better to place that authority in the hands of qualified persons, who would give that attention to it?

Secretary BAKER. Surely, Senator.

Senator LENROOT. And then, I understand you, that in time of peace, with the suggestion that I have made, not to interfere with the discretion of the reviewing or confirming authorities, but to confine it solely to passing upon questions of law, you would see no objection to such a court?

Secretary BAKER. None whatever.

Senator LENROOT. In time of war, for instance, with reference to the late war, if such an appellate tribunal could be created in the field of operations, would there be any objection then?

Secretary BAKER. None, that I can see.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is so of the British system?

Secretary BAKER. I can see no possible objection. If I understood you correctly, it results in this, that in time of peace there would be the appellate tribunal which would review these records, and if it found prejudicial error, would send them back to the convening authorities and tell them to try the case over again.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Secretary BAKER. But if they found nothing prejudicial there, it would send it up to the confirming authority with a recommendation for the confirmation.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; and the court itself exercise no discretion whatever.

Secretary BAKER. Yes, and in the field operations a similar body to that, organized to deal in a similar way.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Secretary BAKER. I can see no objection to that at all.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. Secretary, speaking of the point that was made by Senator Lenroot with reference to civilian lawyers who are temporarily commissioned in the Judge Advocate General's Office, while I am in accord with your view that they are high-class men, yet have you not found, as a matter of fact, in your experience as Secretary of War, that wherever a civilian dons a uniform, he stands more or less in awe, or rather more or less in the attitude of a military inferior, of those who are above him, and does not frequently exercise his own judgment in the matters which come before him?

Secretary BAKER. No; I have not discovered that, Senator.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Well, I have.

Secretary BAKER. I think my experience is larger than yours, Senator. I think that no tribute to the officers of the Army would be too great which explained and made known the independence of judgment, the integrity of conscience, which they exhibit toward their duty.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. We have had civilians in uniform come before committees of the Senate and express regret that they had ever put on the uniform; and in undertaking to discharge the duties which come to them they are bound more or less by military etiquette. They can not help it.

Secretary BAKER. Senator, I get every day of my life papers which originate in an inquiry in the War Department, and they will start with a second lieutenant and go up to the Chief of Staff, and I find complete independence of judgment in the indorsements that are put upon those papers by military men.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You may be right about it. I doubt if you have had more experience than I.

Secretary BAKER. I am not disposed to deny that there are, every once in a while, flunkies in the Army. There are in every place.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It is not flunkies in uniform that I am talking of, but men in your own office have been demoted in the service for disagreement with their superiors in the service.

Secretary BAKER. I do not happen to remember any such cases.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. How about Gen. Kenly?

Secretary BAKER. I do not think that he was demoted for being in disagreement with his superiors.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. A very short time elapsed in his case, after he came up and told about the aviation section, before he was disciplined.

Secretary BAKER. I feel quite sure that no discipline was inflicted upon Gen. Kenly.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Then look what happened to Ansell.

Secretary BAKER. Well, what happened to Ansell?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. He was practically taken out of that office which he occupied, the Judge-Advocate-General's Office.

Secretary BAKER. Yes, all right.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I am speaking of what happened to him because he disagreed with his superiors.

Secretary BAKER. He not only disagreed with his superiors, but he slandered his superiors, and he was generally—well, it is almost impossible to describe the state of mind into which Gen. Ansell had gotten.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I do not think that the record here will show that he slandered his superiors. What became of Gen. McCain who, in the performance of his functions in The Adjutant General's Office, differed with the Chief of Staff?

Secretary BAKER. I never knew that Gen. McCain differed with the Chief of Staff on any official matter. I will be glad to put into this record what happened to him. Gen. McCain was the first officer I came in contact with when I came to Washington. I admired him, and I admire him now. He is a soldier, every inch of him; and I gave Gen. McCain the reward that the soldier's heart delights in. I took him out of an office in the department and put him at the head of a division to go to France to fight. How that can be regarded as punitive action, I can not understand.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Did he ask it?

Secretary BAKER. No.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I think he did not. I think that Gen. McCain thought that he could serve his country better in The Adjutant General's Office. He was for maintaining the status quo in The Adjutant General's Office. He was in conflict with the Chief of Staff.

Secretary BAKER. I never knew that he was. Gen. McCain was a vigorous, capable officer, and as such was selected to go to France when that was the highest reward in the gift of the Secretary of War. Men have wept in my office for the chance, and I gave it to Gen. McCain.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Did Gen. McCain ask it?

Secretary BAKER. No; Gen. McCain was a soldier. He did his duty where he was put.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. He never had any experience out of The Adjutant General's Office? He was there for many years, was he not?

Secretary BAKER. At the time I put him in command of a division, I was under the impression that he had had experience in the command of troops. It seems that I was misinformed as to that. I thought Gen. McCain had led a regiment in the Philippines with conspicuous gallantry, and I had the idea that here was a fine soldier that ought not to be kept here doing bureau work when the rewards of his profession lay with the Army in the field.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Had he been in the field?

Secretary BAKER. I do not know.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. He had had more to do with the service of The Adjutant General's Office, had he not?

Secretary BAKER. I do not know. But my idea, as I said, was that he had that record of service in the field.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You knew that he had been for many years in The Adjutant General's Department?

Secretary BAKER. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And he was a young officer when first assigned there? Who recommended him for that service in the field? He did not ask it?

Secretary BAKER. I selected him, personally.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You do not know that he was insisting upon maintaining the authority of The Adjutant General's Department and that he separated measurably from the Chief of Staff?

Secretary BAKER. No.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I wish you had found that out.

Secretary BAKER. I knew, of course, that there were constant questions of jurisdiction arising among all the bureaus there; but that there was any disagreement, any conflict of authority, between Gen. McCain and Gen. March, I never heard until now.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I just cite those instances to show the justice of my contention that where an inferior officer separates in his views from his chief, he is very apt to feel the ax.

Secretary BAKER. That is not the fact, Senator.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Well, I am convinced that it is.

Secretary BAKER. What is the fact is this, that officers of the Army come down here and testify before the Committees on Military Affairs of the Senate and of the House, and then anything that happens to them, no matter what, is regarded as punitive and disciplinary.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Of course you can always say that it is not punitive.

Secretary BAKER. You can not run the Army on the fact that if a man comes down here and testifies before a military committee, he is removed from the control of his superiors. The Army can not be run that way.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What happened to Col. Weeks?

Secretary BAKER. Col. Weeks was sent down to be department judge advocate of the Department of the Southeast on the recommendation of Gen. Kreger, because he was not in harmony in the operation of that office.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is exactly what I am trying to call your attention to now; where the inferior officer is not in harmony with his chief, he goes out, somewhere.

Secretary BAKER. Yes; of course; and he ought to.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is what I am trying to get at.

Secretary BAKER. Of course, he ought to.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. He does, anyway,

Secretary BAKER. That is fortunate. You can not run an office with everybody running it in opposite directions.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. But the chief always happens to be right.

Secretary BAKER. The chief must be right as long as he is chief. As soon as the chief goes wrong, you change the chief.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Have you ever changed a chief?

Secretary BAKER. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Where?

Secretary BAKER. I changed a chief when I put Gen. Kreger in charge of the Judge Advocate General's office.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That was a change on paper rather than in practice. Gen. Crowder is still Judge Advocate General.

Secretary BAKER. Yes; he is now. Gen. Kreger was the operating head for a while.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I believe that is all.

Senator LENROOT. I have nothing further.

Senator WARREN. Mr. Secretary, in Gen. Crowder's testimony he alluded to differences in statements made on the question of veracity as between himself and Gen. Ansell, and he spoke in a passing manner of that testimony regarding the Secretary of War. Do you want to allude to that testimony, to any of the statements made?

Secretary BAKER. Senator, I do not think I have any observations to make about it beyond this: Somewhere in his testimony—I do not know where it is, but somewhere in Gen. Ansell's testimony—there is a statement that the Secretary of War was inaccessible to Gen. Ansell. I want to enter the most positive and unequivocal contradiction to that statement. Gen. Ansell came into my office with as much freedom as my own secretary came in. He came when he wanted to come, and there never was a suggestion that the Secretary of War was inaccessible to Gen. Ansell.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I think probably that has been misapprehended a little bit. I think Gen. Ansell, when he was authorized by Gen. Crowder to reach you, reached you through military channels—through the Chief of Staff.

Secretary BAKER. The impression which Gen. Ansell's testimony gives—I know nothing about what he intended to say, but the impression that his testimony gives—is that it was necessary for him to reach me through military channels, and exactly the opposite is the truth. He came to me freely, and he came to me upon all sorts of occasions, and there is not in the records of the War Department a single recommendation of Gen. Ansell's looking to a better adjustment of the Judge Advocate General's office, which was ever presented by him and refused by me, with the solitary exception of the matter of section 1199 of the Revised Statutes, in which I did not agree with Gen. Ansell, and the recommendation that all of the court-martial cases that had been reviewed by Gen. Ansell—by the board of which he was president—should be reviewed over again because the work had not been properly done, which I did not believe. I do not happen to remember all the things that are in this record that Gen. Ansell said that could come within the scope of—— Senator WARREN. The committee has no interest in that, unless you want to take it up.

Secretary BAKER. I have no interest in it, but this is the feeling I had about it. A very serious controversy arose between Gen. Ansell and Gen. Crowder. Senator Chamberlain, of course, espoused Gen. Ansell's side of that controversy.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. His view, rather.

Secretary BAKER. Yes; his view; and I think his side of the controversy.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Secretary BAKER. The matter was spoken about in many forums where I had no opportunity to reply, where it was impossible for me to reply. I was Gen. Ansell's superior officer, and might be called men to be his judge. When Senator Chamberlain spoke up in the floor, of course I had no answer to give him. When he or Gen. Ansell made speeches in either house, or gave newspapers interviews, of course I had no opportunity to reply to them, because I had to remember that I might be called upon to justify Gen. Ansell's actions. What has seemed to me to be important in the whole matter is this, that if the controversy was one which was affecting prejudicially the administration of justice in the Army, then it would be necessary for me to act in the matter; and I accordingly referred the matter to the Inspector General of the Army, and by and by a report, and you have the instructions that I gave him. I asked him to find out whether the disagreements and the controversy in the Judge Advocate General's Office were of a character that were affecting prejudicially the administration of justice or reviewing relations which ought to proceed from that office to me in the matter of discipline. Gen. Chamberlain went through the case carefully, his report is here, and it discloses that the administration of the office was not prejudiced by that controversy. It then seemed to me to be a matter that was largely indifferent.

SENATOR WARREN. Have you anything further urged upon by these questions that you wish to present for our consideration?

SECRETARY BAKER. Nothing at all, that I recall, unless there is something in the minds of the committee.

SENATOR WARREN. Have you anything further, Senator Lenroot?

SENATOR LENROOT. No.

SENATOR CHAMBERLAIN. I have nothing further.

Secretary Baker subsequently submitted the following memorandum:

The typewritten manuscript of the hearing was submitted to me through the courtesy of the chairman of the subcommittee, and I was required to make any additions or corrections. I have read it carefully and am myself perplexed at the inconsistency between my answers to the questions of Senator Chamberlain and those of Senator Lenroot with regard to the creation of an appellate power. This inconsistency I can only explain by the feeling that in answering Senator Lenroot I had in my mind the same sort of a tribunal as suggested by Senator Chamberlain, which would function under the President as Commander in Chief of the Army. My mind at that time apparently was dealing with the cases which come to the President as the commanding authority, and my answers to Senator Lenroot's questions are therefore misleading, since he plainly had in mind the creation of an appellate tribunal which would function independently of the President as commander in law. It seems to me important that I should state clearly and frankly the view I entertain on this subject of appellate power.

The President being the Commander in Chief of the Army, the supervisory control of discipline must of necessity rest in him and be exercised through such subordinate agencies in the Army as the exigencies of the situation from time to time require; and, in so far as discipline is enforceable by trial through such tribunals as Congress shall from time to time establish. The institution of any extraneous and independent appellate power, interrupting the exercise of the full powers of the Commander in Chief, would inevitably weaken and might conceivably gravely imperil the authority of the President as the Commander in Chief and the commanding generals chosen by him in fields of action. The idea of an appellate power is wise, and our experience in this war shows its propriety. There should be no case of discipline in the Army beyond the reach of the Commander in Chief for correction. To accomplish this complete control boards of review organized in the office of the Judge Advocate General, or, when the Army is operating in actual warfare, organized as independent commands, should have the power, under regulations prescribed by the President and, therefore, by his authority, to review court-martial proceedings and, upon the detection of errors of law, should have the right to return a record to the convening authority, pointing out the error of law and directing a retrial or disapproval of the proceedings.

and the restoration of the accused to his previous status. This should, however, be systematically organized under the direction of the President and at all times under his control and subject to general orders from the President which would lay down the policy to be followed under the law in the administration of discipline through the imposition of penalties.

The creation of a court of appeal with the power to substitute its judgment for that of the President as Commander in Chief, is, in my judgment, unnecessary and would be destructive in large measure of the single channel of command upon which efficient discipline in a military organization necessarily depends.

The emphasis laid in the discussion upon errors of law, as distinguished from errors of fact, seems to me to take too narrow a view both of the appellate power desirable and of the nature of court martial proceedings. The appellate power should be able to reach errors of fact as well as errors of law, and the President and those delegated by him under regulations to act in his behalf, should have the power to control these proceedings for errors of fact as well as mere technical errors of law. As a matter of fact, we have had in the War Department some controversy as to what is an error of law, and sometimes palpable errors of fact have been held to be errors of law in order that a remedy might be applied. We ought, therefore, not to prescribe a narrow technical rule, but a broad and generous power which will enable the President to supply a remedy when an error is discovered.

(Thereupon, at 12.15 o'clock p. m., the subcommittee adjourned, subject to the call of the chairman.)

ESTABLISHMENT OF MILITARY JUSTICE—PROPOSED AMENDMENT OF THE ARTICLES OF WAR.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1919.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to the call of the chairman, in the room of the Committee on Appropriations, at 11 o'clock a. m., Senator Francis E. Warren presiding.

Present, Senators Warren (chairman) and Chamberlain.

STATEMENT OF MR. E. M. MORGAN, PROFESSOR, LAW SCHOOL, YALE UNIVERSITY, NEW HAVEN, CONN.

Senator WARREN. Col. Morgan is here this morning, and we shall hear him now. Col. Morgan, I suppose you know that this subcommittee is considering the military justice law that exists, and suggested amendments thereto, particularly as proposed in Senate bill 64, introduced by Senator Chamberlain, which I presume you have seen.

Mr. MORGAN. I have seen that; yes, sir.

Senator WARREN. The committee would be glad to have you, in your own way, make any observations you care to make about the present law and the proposed bill.

Mr. MORGAN. Do you want me to state my experience with the Judge Advocate General's Department, first?

Senator WARREN. Of course, so far as the law is concerned, that is what we are particularly concerned about now. Any incident that you wish to state we would be glad to have; but what we are trying to do is simply to see what we should do in way of legislation.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Let me suggest, first, as a basis, that Col. Morgan state what his connection with the Army was and what his experience has been.

Senator WARREN. I assumed that he would do that.

Mr. MORGAN. That is what I was asking about. I wanted to know if you desired me to state my experience.

Senator WARREN. State what you have been doing in connection with the administration of the law.

Mr. MORGAN. In September, 1918, I was commissioned as a major in the Judge Advocate General's Reserve Corps, and I was ordered to duty in Washington as assistant to the Judge Advocate General. Later in the month, I was made chief of a new division, called the War Laws Division, in the Office of the Judge Advocate General.

Senator WARREN. What rank were you given?

Mr. MORGAN. Major, judge advocate.

ESTABLISHMENT OF MILITARY JUSTICE—PROPOSED AMENDMENT OF THE ARTICLES OF WAR.

---

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1919.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to the call of the chairman, in the room of the Committee on Appropriations, at 11 o'clock a. m., Senator Francis E. Warren presiding.

Present, Senators Warren (chairman) and Chamberlain.

STATEMENT OF MR. E. M. MORGAN, PROFESSOR, LAW SCHOOL, YALE UNIVERSITY, NEW HAVEN, CONN.

Senator WARREN. Col. Morgan is here this morning, and we shall hear him now. Col. Morgan, I suppose you know that this subcommittee is considering the military justice law that exists, and suggested amendments thereto, particularly as proposed in Senate bill 64, introduced by Senator Chamberlain, which I presume you have seen.

Mr. MORGAN. I have seen that; yes, sir.

Senator WARREN. The committee would be glad to have you, in your own way, make any observations you care to make about the present law and the proposed bill.

Mr. MORGAN. Do you want me to state my experience with the Judge Advocate General's Department, first?

Senator WARREN. Of course, so far as the law is concerned, that is what we are particularly concerned about now. Any incident that you wish to state we would be glad to have; but what we are trying to do is simply to see what we should do in way of legislation.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Let me suggest, first, as a basis, that Col. Morgan state what his connection with the Army was and what his experience has been.

Senator WARREN. I assumed that he would do that.

Mr. MORGAN. That is what I was asking about. I wanted to know if you desired me to state my experience.

Senator WARREN. State what you have been doing in connection with the administration of the law.

Mr. MORGAN. In September, 1918, I was commissioned as a major in the Judge Advocate General's Reserve Corps, and I was ordered to duty in Washington as assistant to the Judge Advocate General. Later in the month, I was made chief of a new division, called the War Laws Division, in the Office of the Judge Advocate General.

Senator WARREN. What rank were you given?

Mr. MORGAN. Major, judge advocate.

As chief of the War Laws Division, one of my duties was to go over all of the current opinions of the Judge Advocate General and to select those that were of sufficient importance to be sent out to the service, either by way of abstracts or mimeographed copies. At first the reviews of cases in the military justice division did not come over my desk. The extent to which I was concerned with them was simply in passing upon certain suggested notes upon the administration of military justice which the chief of that division thought ought to go to the service.

Senator WARREN. You are speaking of going to the service; do you mean abroad, or here?

Mr. MORGAN. All the judge advocates in the field.

Senator WARREN. In this country and abroad?

Mr. MORGAN. Every place. On our mailing list we had all the judge advocates who were in the service. Later, all the reviews of court-martial cases came over my desk, with the idea that I should select therefrom statements of the new or important principles that were being applied, and send them out to the service.

Thereafter, I was detailed to organize the war risk insurance division of the Judge Advocate General's Department; and after that was organized, I was made chief of the general administration division of the office, which was also designated the miscellaneous division.

While I was chief of that division I was getting out, among other things, notes on military law. These were sent to the service. They dealt with the proper interpretation of the Articles of War, the interpretation being based upon accepted American military writers, such as Col. Winthrop, Gens. Davis, O'Brien, and Benet, and the English writers, particularly upon the decisions of the Judge Advocate General during this war. In that way, I became familiar with practically all the important decisions of the Judge Advocate General upon the administration of military justice. Furthermore, when the force was comparatively small, we had frequent conferences on the really important cases, and in that way I kept somewhat in touch with them.

Later I was made chairman of the general board of review of the office, which reviewed all opinions of officers before they went to the Judge Advocate General for signature. This did not include the military justice opinions, however.

Afterward I was detailed as acting chairman of the special clemency board. I acted in that capacity for three or four weeks immediately prior to my leaving the service on May 31, 1919.

I left the service with the rank of lieutenant-colonel, which was merely one grade above that in which I entered, having been promoted in July, 1918. That, I believe, gives my qualifications.

Senator WARREN. I will state that this subcommittee consists of three members, but Senator Lenroot is also a member of an important conference which is sitting this morning, and he can not be here. I told him that Senator Chamberlain would be here, and he said to go on without him.

Mr. MORGAN. My experience firmly convinced me that the existing system is defective in four or five particulars. To begin with, the procedure for preparing charges and bringing the accused to trial, as it was practiced during a greater part of the war, seemed insufficient.

Senator WARREN. You say the greater part of the war. Will you explain when?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; during the entire period of hostilities it seemed to me that the cases all showed that the charges had been preferred without any particularly thorough preliminary examination. That was attempted to be changed by an amendment to paragraph 76 of the court-martial manual, and the introduction of paragraph 76-a. That change was made in response to a memorandum of the Acting Judge Advocate General of April 4, 1919, and it finally got through the General Staff and the War College, I believe, after I left the service in July, 1919.

The new paragraphs promulgate a regulation requiring a thorough investigation of the facts, before a charge is preferred. They also require the officer, who is to appoint a general court-martial, to seek the advice of his judge advocate as to whether or not a prima facie case is made out and as to whether or not the charge states a violation of law. He was not, therefore, required to do that, and under the regulation he is not bound to follow the advice given.

The new bill makes additional safeguards there, in that it requires charges to be preferred under oath, and makes the opinion of the legal officer binding.

Senator WARREN. I understand you to say that that was promulgated before you left, and not put into practice until after you left?

Mr. MORGAN. No, it was not promulgated before I left. It was suggested before I left, by a memorandum of April, 1919. I left on May 31, and the particular changes in the court-martial manual came out in July.

Senator WARREN. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN. The guaranties of impartiality of the appointing authority and the court struck me also as being defective. There was, as you all know, on the statute books a provision which prevented the appointment of a court by a person who was the accuser or the prosecutor. That had been on the books since the passage of the act of May 3, 1830. But there was, and is yet, no provision disqualifying an appointing authority for actual bias or constructive bias, unless he is the accuser or prosecutor. In the same way the members of the court are subject to challenge by the accused only for cause. There is no peremptory challenge, and there is not any challenge of any kind to the panel. There is nobody to determine the truth or falsity of challenges except the remaining members of the court. The result was, as occurred in a great number of cases—that is, in enough cases, anyway, to cause my attention to be especially attracted to it—where three or four persons were charged separately and were to be tried separately for having committed a joint offense, all the cases were referred to a general court. This court would try case A, for example. When case B came up for trial, since the evidence would be practically the same and would concern the same transaction, counsel for the defense in case B must challenge only one member at a time. When he challenged one member of the court, the other members of the court, who were subject to exactly the same challenge, would have to pass upon that challenge. It would seem fairly obvious that those other members were disqualified to pass upon that particular challenge, and that there really ought to be some basis for challenging the whole panel in a case of that character. At least, it strikes a civilian lawyer that way.

That was one of the things that I found that most military lawyers could not be made to see. They could not see why a jury or a court which had tried A for an offense in which B, C, and D were all involved could not go right on and try B for that same offense, and then try C for the same offense, and then try D for the same offense, where the testimony would be practically identical in all the cases.

Senator WARREN. Your idea is that the fact of trying A and finding him guilty would so bias their minds that they would not try the remaining cases upon the facts as they appeared?

Mr. MORGAN. I could not think, Senator, that they could try the second, third, or fourth cases impartially. At any rate, by the time that they got to the fourth case they would know just exactly what testimony was going to be introduced, and they would have their minds all made up just as soon as the case began.

Senator WARREN. What would be the consequence if A was found guilty, and if for the case of A the panel was challenged and a new panel found B not guilty; what about challenging the panel then? Of course the accused would not do it, but the Government would have a right to.

Mr. MORGAN. I should think that the Government ought to have a right to.

Senator WARREN. In trying 3 or 4 men for the same offense, to get a panel in some of these smaller cases would be quite difficult. I realize the justice in your contention, but I wondered whether, if legislation read that way, there would have to be exceptions made of those cases where there are not sufficient officers. Of course in important cases, you understand, they would have to go until they did have men enough.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; and you understand an accused can be sent to any place in the country for trial, and that, of course, would take care of any real practical difficulty with reference to that matter.

Senator WARREN. And as to the peremptory challenges, you think that they should have the privileges that they have in civil life?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes. I do not know that they should have so many peremptory challenges as are given in actual practice in civil life, because, of course, there the challenges run sometimes to a very great number; but undoubtedly your experience has been that of other men who are interested in the law, that it is impossible, frequently, to get men, who are really biased, off a jury, because of the answers that they make to the questions put to them; and furthermore, there may be a perfectly good reason why an accused should have them off without disclosing fully to the court the reasons therefor. That is, there ought to be some basis for peremptory challenge, and the thing that strikes me is that there ought to be, of course, some method of trying challenges for cause, other than that of leaving it to the remaining members of the court.

Senator WARREN. Simply a peremptory challenge?

Mr. MORGAN. You ought to have peremptory challenges; yes, sir.

Then the point that has always struck me as being most remarkable in the court-martial system is the inadequacy of the presentation of the facts and the law at the trial. Of course, the trial is supposed to be a criminal prosecution; and your court-martial manual tells you that the rules of evidence that are applicable in Federal courts are to be applied by the court-martial, except in so far as they are changed by the court-martial manual, which operates as a regulation of the President.

These rules of evidence, even with their changes in the chapter on the evidence in the court-martial manual, are just as difficult of application as the rules which the United States district court has to apply in the trial of criminal cases. The questions of law that are presented in these courts-martial are just as intricate, in many cases, as those that are presented to the United States district judge or any court of first instance. And yet there is no provision for any judicial supervision of the trial, there is no provision for legal learning on the part of either the members of the court or any official that corresponds to a nisi prius judge, nor is there any provision for learning on the part of the counsel for the prosecution or for the defense, other than that which necessarily attaches to the status of a commissioned officer. The cases really show an astounding ignorance on the part of counsel for the prosecution, of counsel for the defense, and members of the court. It would be difficult to believe, really, the facts revealed by the records.

While I was reviewing cases as chairman of the special clemency board, at times, when a case was marked "well tried," or "poorly tried," or "very poorly tried," I would dip into the record and see how the thing went. I remember striking one case, which I hardly think is a fair sample, but which is a striking example of ignorance of counsel and court. It was a case where a man was on trial for desertion. Counsel for the prosecution simply read the charges and read a provision of the court-martial manual which said that if a man was absent without leave for an extended period, that justified an inference of desertion. He did not put in a word of testimony, but he said, "We rest." Counsel for the accused called his man and said that he desired to have him make an unsworn statement; not to have him go on the stand and make a sworn statement, but to make an unsworn statement. The accused went on the stand and stated that neither at a specified time and place, nor at any other place, did he ever intend to desert the service of the United States; and then he rested. They were going to proceed to argument, when counsel for the prosecution insisted that counsel for the defense had no right to argue on that unsworn statement, as it was not testimony. Of course it was not. The court there interrupted to ask if counsel for the prosecution did not have any more testimony. He said no, that he did not have more. Then the court asked him if he did not have the testimony of the officer who arrested the man. He said, "No, that officer could not testify to anything except what was shown on the investigation." Thereupon the court closed and went into session to consider their judgment, and they came out with the startling announcement that they found there was not sufficient evidence to justify either conviction or acquittal, and they therefore ordered counsel to move for a continuance until they could get evidence that would justify acquittal or conviction.

Frequently you find cases where a counsel for the defense has made absolutely no defense, where it is shown by subsequent investigation at the disciplinary barracks that his client was an imbecile, absolutely incapable of forming the intent that was necessary for the commission of the offense with which he was charged.

I remember one case where a chaplain acting as counsel said that he was not going to make any defense on the ground of mental incapacity on the part of the defendant; that the court could see him; that they could judge of his mental capacity; and he did not believe in sending these soldiers to "nut" boards, as they call boards of psychiatry in the Army, because he believed a soldier of that kind ought either to be emasculated or to be sent to Leavenworth, anyhow. That man was defending a client on the charge of desertion, which was an offense during the war for which his client could have received a sentence of death and did receive a sentence of 10 years.

Senator WARREN. That was his defense?

Mr. MORGAN. That was his defense, and that was all.

Other cases I remember where counsel simply stated, on the trial for desertion, where a man was on trial for his life, that he had not had any time to make any investigation.

Senator WARREN. I can see, of course, the applicability of those stories, and of course it is very interesting; but explain, as you go along, or later, how we should change the law to cover that.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I would like to have him give those instances.

Senator WARREN. Of course, I am not cutting him off, but we want his advice about how to correct these things.

Mr. MORGAN. I am simply giving these cases as so many illustrations, and I think they are fairly characteristic of the facts.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The chairman speaks of them as "stories." You do not give them as stories or on hearsay, but you are speaking of cases that actually came to your attention when you were in the Judge Advocate General's Office?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; I can give you the reference to every one of these cases.

Senator WARREN. The chairman has not any intention whatsoever of challenging that.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. No.

Senator WARREN. The only point is, to keep in view all the time what our duty is, to propose some law to overcome this, and we want that as well as to get these instances, which are valuable. We want your advice as to how we may, by legislation, prevent those things.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; I understand that, Senator. I am simply trying to point out that under the present system, counsel for the prosecution and counsel for the defense, and the court, who are the functionaries, of course, that have to try these really serious criminal cases, are all ignorant of the fundamentals necessary to prove an offense or a defense. Counsel for the prosecution frequently does not know what elements he has to prove; and counsel for the defense has very little idea, really, of what he should put in in order to free his client.

In other words, they do not know or appreciate either the substantive law or the rules of evidence that are applicable in the particular case. That is because, I think, the matter of attending to courts-martial is an extra duty usually put upon very busy line officers, and usually these line officers, who are for the prosecution or the defense, have to do that as extra duty and not as their chief duty. We hold courts-martial, of course, whenever it is convenient to hold them, but we do not detail men exclusively for the work.

The result under the present system seems to me to be just this, Senator: It is as if you turned loose a common-law jury to try a case, with unskilled counsel, and without any judicial supervision at the trial at all. Now, it seems to me that the proposed bill, Senate 64, does provide a remedy for that, first in providing for judicial supervision at the trial by an officer learned in the law, who shall really take the place of a nisi prius judge. This officer, who is called the judge advocate of the court, would decide the truth or falsity of all challenges, thus remedying one serious defect in the present system. He would also be able to rule judicially on the admission or exclusion of evidence, having proper qualifications therefor in his learning as to the rules of evidence and as to the rules of substantive law applicable to the case. You would have there at least a judge who knew the law.

Now, as to the learning of the judge advocate, in the changes to the court-martial manual that were made by changes No. 5, it is attempted by regulation to get more skilled counsel. It is provided that a man should not be a trial judge advocate—that is, the prosecuting officer—unless he has had experience at least on a court-martial and has acted as assistant judge advocate, I believe. It is also stated there that counsel for the accused should have the same qualifications as the trial judge advocate, where possible; and of course accused has the privilege of getting civilian counsel. The bill writes that into legislation and makes it mandatory on the parties to furnish trial judge advocates of learning. It seems to me that that will correct to a very great extent the crudeness of the trial.

Senator WARREN. You make that very clear. Now, so far as the other members are concerned, you have to accept them as you would a jury drawn from the body of the people?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Senator WARREN. You draw them from the body of the Army?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Senator WARREN. And of course you have to take them by and large, as they come, except that they are selected by the skill of the man who makes the appointments.

Mr. MORGAN. Exactly, sir. I think there is no question about that. We have got to realize that there are some drawbacks in the Army that could not possibly be overcome, I suppose, with reference to a military trial. The next thing that strikes the civilian lawyer as most peculiar is the control of the appointing authority over the court. As you know, under the present system a general court can consist of anywhere from 5 to 13 officers. A panel may be arranged with 13 officers, and those 13 officers may begin the trial. Either the appointing authority or any superior military authority may remove any one of those officers at any time during the trial, relieve him from court-martial duty, and send him to any other duty; and as long as he keeps that court above 5 members there can be no objection on the part of the accused or on the part of the prosecution; so that you might start a trial with 13 officers and end it with 5.

Furthermore, the appointing authority may add new members during the trial of a case, provided he does not exceed the statutory maximum. So that if he has 5 members on now, he may add 3 members in the middle of the trial. To these new members the testimony that has been taken will be read over.

Senator WARREN. I was going to ask you how that would be conveyed to them.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; they just have the testimony read over. They do not begin the trial de novo. So that you might, presumably, begin a trial with 13 members of the court and end with 5, and have among the 5 members who decide the case no man who was on the original panel. These 5 might have heard most of the testimony merely by having it read over to them. O'Brien, the military writer, disapproves of this practice. O'Brien says it is entirely illegal. Col. Winthrop says that it had been in vogue in our Army for over 50 years when he was writing.

Senator WARREN. You propose to change that by having a fixed number?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; as the bill states.

Senator WARREN. Do you allow any latitude on account of location, and so forth, as to the number?

Mr. MORGAN. I would make it as small as I thought could conveniently and justly try cases, and then fix it at that for all general courts, wherever they might be sitting.

Senator WARREN. If you put it at 10 or at 13, it must be that number?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Senator WARREN. And you would not allow changes during the trial?

Mr. MORGAN. I should not allow these changes. Now, I do not say that there has been any manipulation.

Senator WARREN. I understand. We want to get at your ideas of the law as it should be.

Mr. MORGAN. But you can see that there is a tremendous chance for manipulation of the membership of the court.

Senator WARREN. What have you to say about the desirability of using enlisted men for any part of the membership of the court?

Mr. MORGAN. I think, theoretically, it is a fine thing, but practically, I do not know, Senator. I have talked with many regular officers, and almost all of them have, to that feature of the present bill, offered objections that seemed to me to have weight. Some of them have said this, that it would divide a court into officers and enlisted men, and there would be a sharp conflict each time. I doubt very much whether that would be true, but I do think that under our present system the enlisted men would be entirely overawed by the officers.

I have felt that some representation of enlisted men might very well be provided for, on the same theory that the French did it. They always provided that when an enlisted man or a noncommissioned officer was to be tried, one of the members, at least, should be a non-commissioned officer, the idea being to get the enlisted man's viewpoint in the court.

Senator WARREN. Yes; we have had that matter before us.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; I suppose you have. But on that proposition I really do not feel competent to answer, because I have never had any experience in the field, and I do not know what effect that would really have upon the man when he was returned to his company after having convicted a comrade, or anything of that sort. I do not know what effect that would have.

Of course you all know that the reviewing authority under the system as it was during the whole war, and up to August 10, 1919, had practically absolute command not only over the personnel of the court, but over the findings and sentence of the court, the power of sending the case back for revision, as it is called.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. From the commanding officer?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir; that is the appointing authority sending the case back for revision; and the appointing authority would send it back with an indorsement to the effect that he did not agree with the finding of not guilty, for example. Of course he did not have to send it back if he did not agree with a finding of guilty. In such case he could disapprove the sentence, or the finding and sentence. But if he wanted to change a finding of not guilty to guilty, he would have to send the case back with an indorsement, and I have seen them accompanied with very strong arguments to the effect that the court should make another finding. I think you have statistics before you showing changes from guilty to not guilty, showing that in one-third of the cases the court made the changes suggested, and in the other two-thirds of the cases, adhered to its finding. I have seen no statistics of the number of times when the court increased the penalty at the request of the reviewing authority; that is, where the appointing authority sends back an indorsement in which he says that the court will reconvene and consider the adequacy of its sentence, and adds certain arguments or statements, or suggestions are made to show its inadequacy. Such statistics were, to my knowledge, compiled.

Senator WARREN. As I understood you, the court adhered to its findings in two-thirds of those cases?

Mr. MORGAN. No; it was only from not guilty to guilty. They changed from not guilty to guilty in one-third of those cases, and adhered to their findings in two-thirds; but where the convening authority has sent the case back for an increase of the sentence, in a large majority of such cases, they did not adhere to their sentence; they changed it. Those statistics were compiled, but I was not able to find them; and I noticed that Gen. Crowder in sending the statistics to the Senate Committee included only those where the change in the finding was from not guilty to guilty. Now, that, of course, strikes a civilian as something entirely unusual, and the War Department has finally yielded to public sentiment, in so far as to issue a general order, No. 88, which was issued in July, effective August 10, 1919, which forbids the sending back of a case for revision upward of the sentence.

Senator WARREN. I understood that to be the fact. I do not know the date when it was effective.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; of course it is since the termination of hostilities. In fact, it became effective on August 10.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That general order forbade the convening authority to send not-guilty cases back for a finding of guilty?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; or that a sentence should be sent back for revision upward, and unless this sentence was mandatory by act of Congress and the court had given a sentence under the statutory minimum. Of course, the proposed bill would take away the control of the appointing authority over the personnel of the court and over the finding; that is, so far as to prevent the court from sending back a finding of not guilty for reconsideration. In fact, the present reviewing authority's functions, so far as the review of the particular record is concerned, are pretty well eliminated by the present bill.

Then the other matter on which there has been considerable dispute, and where the civilian lawyer is somewhat shocked, is that there is no real judicial review for the correction of errors. There is a review, of course, but it is a review by the power of military command all the way through; and during the war, of course, it was demonstrated that the review by the military command as authorized in the Articles of War was inadequate. I think General Order No. 7 and General Order No. 84 of 1918 demonstrated that conclusively. Of course, you remember the occasion of the issuance of General Order No. 7. It was on account of those cases in the South.

Senator WARREN. Yes, that has been gone into very thoroughly before the committee.

Mr. MORGAN. I need not go into that at all, then. General Orders 7 and 84 showed conclusively that some sort of review by a legal officer was an absolute necessity.

Senator WARREN. And you approve of those orders?

Mr. MORGAN. Oh, yes; I approve thoroughly of those orders. But I think that they ought not to be left to Army regulations or general orders. The matter ought to be covered by legislation. The orders do not go far enough.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. In that connection, that brings up the construction of section 1199 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You know the contention of Gen. Crowder on the one theory of it and the contention of Gen. Ansell on the other?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Senator WARREN. Do you mind expressing your views with respect to section 1199 of the Revised Statutes?

Mr. MORGAN. As an original question of statutory construction, it seems to me there could be very little doubt that section 1199 was intended to give the Judge Advocate General the power which an appellate court usually has to revise or reverse judgments of military tribunals. I think the legislative history of the act, the circumstances under which it was passed, the ordinary legislative meaning of the term "revise" and the term "review," as used in the constitutions and codes of the various States, show very clearly, very convincingly, that the words "revise" and "review" were intended to make the Judge Advocate General's Office, or the bureau of military justice as it was called at that time, a real appellate tribunal.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. With power to reverse or modify?

Mr. MORGAN. Oh, yes; to reverse or modify: and I think that is made doubly clear by the fact that the act related to the military establishment and used the word "revise," which for at least 75 or 100 years prior to the passage of the statute had a definite, technical meaning in the military service. The power of revision in military law is much broader than the power that any ordinary appellate court has to revise. The only decision on the case was the case of ex parte Mason, as you know, which for a long time was unpublished but now has been published in the Federal Reporter. That case contains a dictum to the effect that no power to revise is really given to the Judge Advocate General in section 1199. That is pure dictum, however, and an analysis of the decision will show that the court did not understand the military system at all. It thought that there was a power, some place, of review, and that the Judge Advocate General had the duty of pointing out, merely, and that the proper military authority would revise, forgetting that, in ex parte Mason, if the power did not rest in the Judge Advocate General, there was no power to revise anywhere, for the appointing power had approved the sentence. But there is no doubt—that is, in my opinion there is no doubt—that the military authorities from the time of the enactment of the statute down to the time when Gen. Ansell questioned its interpretation, had really construed the statute as not granting this power of revision.

The military theory has always been that the power to revise or power to control a court-martial sentence is necessarily an attribute of command; and secondly, that it can not be exercised by a staff officer, and the Judge Advocate General and the officers in charge of the bureau of military justice were staff officers. I believe it was on that theory that the Judge Advocate General's Office held that that statute was not intended to give really revisory power.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. In your opinion is not that a strained construction of it?

Mr. MORGAN. I think, as I said before, Senator, as a matter of original statutory construction, it is very badly strained. I think it disregards not only the ordinary meaning of the word "revise" as used in civil legislation but it entirely and absolutely disregards the meaning of "revise" as used in military language and in the military law for at least from 75 to 100 years prior to the passage of the statute.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What would have been the effect to have placed a different construction upon section 1199—that is, the construction which would have permitted the Judge Advocate General to have reviewed, modified, or reversed a verdict of a court-martial?

Mr. MORGAN. It would have, of course, given the Judge Advocate General the right which an ordinary appellate tribunal has to say that a judgment of conviction must be set aside. The case would then, of course, go down to the lower court, the military commander, in accordance with that judgment.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Such a construction of that would necessarily have saved all this conflict?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; such a construction would have saved most of this controversy.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And would have protected the rights of a convicted man?

Mr. MORGAN. There could not be any question in my mind that practically all of these cases that have been so much talked about would never have arisen if that provision had been interpreted in that way. We should have really had a court of military appeals; and if we had had a court of military appeals passing upon the regularity of these trials, in the way that an appellate court usually does, it would have caused the commanders below to have been more careful about the conduct of the trials, it seems to me.

Senator WARREN. It would have been, of course, still under the military arm entirely?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Senator WARREN. You think it is better to have a controlling factor finally outside of the military line?

Mr. MORGAN. I am thoroughly convinced of that, Senator, for two or three reasons. I think the provisions of the present bill are really admirable in that respect. I base that conclusion upon my experience in what would seem to me test cases in the War Department. As long as you keep the whole matter within the military department, as long as you have military officers who form this court of appeals under the control of line officers, under the control of the military hierarchy, with the matter of promotion and preferment, and so forth, all being dependent upon these higher officers, you are bound to have the judgments of the subordinates influenced by the desires of the superiors. We have had two or three examples of that in my experience. I am quite sure you are very familiar with them, and if I am repeating too much, you just stop me.

Senator WARREN. That is all right.

Mr. MORGAN. You remember the time of the first four death cases from France that caused so much trouble—or that caused so much newspaper talk. In those cases, if there had been no civilians connected with the Judge Advocate General's department—civilians in uniform, really, as officers—I doubt very much whether anything would have happened except an execution of those sentences. In the first place, those cases went to Gen. Bethel, a Regular Army officer, judge advocate of the American Expeditionary Forces, and he recommended the approval of the conviction and attached a memorandum, as I remember it, which was a very strong argument for the execution of the sentences. The appointing authority, of course, approved them. The records were transmitted through Gen. Pershing, who was not the appointing authority, and who, as a matter of ordinary routine, would have done nothing whatsoever with the cases. Nevertheless, he attached a memorandum saying that the execution of these men was necessary, or highly advisable, at any rate. Those records came to our office with those indorsements on them. The officer who first reviewed the cases thought there was sufficient evidence to justify a conviction and that the sentence was authorized by law. They went to Gen. Crowder, who saw all these indorsements on them, and he wrote a memorandum, which was in the files, addressed to the Chief of Staff, in which he said in effect that it was highly important that the War Department should present a united front to the President on those cases, and he wanted a personal interview before he sent the records over. After he had had the personal interview he signed the review which recommended the execution of the sentences.

The only dissent from that proposition came from Col. Clark, to begin with. He was a civilian in uniform who was assisting Col. Davis, at that time chief of the military justice bureau. Col. Clark went to Gen. Ansell about those cases personally. He just happened to meet him in the hall, as I remember, and in that way those records were called to Gen. Ansell's attention. He went to see Gen. Crowder about them and was told to put his views in writing, which he did. It seems to me that if the whole matter there had been in the hands of strictly military people, without these civilians happening to interpose, those sentences would have been executed, for under the office practice at that time Gen. Ansell would not have seen them. Now, I am assuming with reference to this, Senator, that those sentences ought not to have been executed. I know that they were not executed. They were held up by the President, and I am assuming that that action was proper. I have not, myself, read the records in those four cases.

Senator WARREN. Before you get away from that, if I do not interrupt you, I want to ask you this.

Mr. MORGAN. No, you are not interrupting.

Senator WARREN. If this committee should recommend and the Congress should pass a law to have a reviewing authority in part or altogether of civilians, you would consider it very much better than to attempt to alter the construction of the words "revise" and "review?"

Mr. MORGAN. Oh, yes; I should, certainly.

Senator WARREN. In other words, to have concluded that that language was susceptible of that interpretation, so as to give this general review that you want, would really have left us in worse shape than we may be in as a consequence of this possible legislation which you are supporting?

Mr. MORGAN. I think that is right, Senator. That is, I believe this: I believe that we should have a system which was much more faulty if section 1199 were construed as I think it should have been construed and the system left unchanged, than we shall have if you adopt this proposed bill, because I think that if section 1199 had been construed that way, we should have a system that would be fairly workable—that is, the abuses would not have challenged the attention of Congress if 1199 had been given that other construction, but I do think that the new system would be much better.

Now, the other cases in which I had that matter forcibly brought to my attention were the negro rape cases. You, I know, remember those cases, where 19 negroes were convicted of rape. It was a big, long record. The judge advocate of the division was a Regular Army officer with the rank of lieutenant colonel. I know that when he came down to the office of the Judge Advocate General with those records, he had them all ready, practically, for a rubber stamp "approved." He thought they would be approved without any question. On the board of review under Col. Reed there were three or four civilians in uniform who were greatly shocked at those records, and were absolutely convinced that there was no ground for upholding the conviction of any of those men. I know that the regular officer in charge of the military justice division, when he saw the alternative was between disapproving the conviction and approving the conviction of all, would have been in favor of approving the conviction of all of them, and then letting the matter be determined by an appeal to the clemency of the President.

The third case was a notorious case, with which you are all familiar, the Tapalina case. On the day that the Judge Advocate General wrote to the Secretary of War a letter for transmission to Senator Chamberlain here, in which he upheld the conviction of Tapalina and showed how it was entirely just, and how Tapalina had really been accorded much more protection than he would have gotten in a civil court, on that very day or the day before, he was informing the Adjutant General that the man had been unjustly convicted, that the injustice should be righted as soon as possible, and that the man should be given a chance to be reinstated on application.

I think those three cases are enough to base a conclusion on, that if the trial is left entirely to the military, whether you put it in the Judge Advocate General, he being a staff officer, or in the Chief of Staff—however that may be—you will not get nearly as satisfactory a review on the merits, as you will if you establish a court where civilians compose part or all the court. Now, I do not know, Senators, that I have anything further. I should be very glad to attempt to answer any questions.

Senator WARREN. You have touched upon the points that we have had most inquiry about.

Senator Chamberlain, do you wish to ask some questions?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Have you ever formulated in your own mind a plan for the organization of an appellate tribunal? How would you have it composed, in part of Army officers and in part of civilians, or in whole of civilians?

Mr. MORGAN. I should have it composed in whole of civilians, if I had anything to do with it.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. For instance, take the case of a man who has been convicted by court-martial; the court was convened by the commanding authority, and there were irregularities in the trial—possibly prejudicial error; and suppose that it came up to this tribunal that you have in mind, and because of errors committed at the trial, the appellate tribunal composed entirely of civilians should conclude that the judgment ought to be set aside, or that it ought to be revised or modified in some way; what would you have done with the finding of the appellate tribunal?

Mr. MORGAN. I should have it transmitted to the appointing authority to be executed, and if a new trial was granted, the appointing authority should determine whether or not the man should be tried anew or let go, so that it should not be taken out of military control.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You would not have the military code or military discipline transferred from the military authority, by this system, to a civilian authority?

Mr. MORGAN. No; I do not think it would be, at all. I think that judicial officers ought to rule on questions of law, and I do not believe that the decision of questions of law can ever be properly said to be an attribute of military command.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I am agreed with you on that.

Mr. MORGAN. And I think that is just the crux of the dispute between the two opposing parties. The military theory is just exactly what Col. Winthrop says of it in his book. He says that a court-martial is not a court; that it is a mere administrative body. I have his language here. He says that courts-martial are:

simply instrumentalities of the Executive power, provided by Congress for the President as Commander in Chief, to aid him in properly commanding the Army and Navy and enforcing discipline therein and utilized under his orders or those of his authorized military representatives.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That theory of it, however, has been set aside by the Supreme Court of the United States in the Runkle case.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes. Col. Winthrop, with all due respect to him—you know, he is by far the most scholarly and able writer we have on the subject of military law—has misinterpreted those decisions of the Supreme Court which say that the court-martial is not a part of the Federal judicial system. He thought, therefore, that it must be a mere executive agency. Of course, the Supreme Court of the United States has said that courts-martial are not appointed under the third article of the Constitution; but there is nothing better settled than that the third article of the Constitution does not exhaust the power of Congress to appoint judicial tribunals. All of the courts of the Territories are appointed under a different provision of the Constitution. And the Supreme Court in the Runkle case quotes Attorney General Bate's opinion to the effect that the proceeding from the beginning to the end is judicial, and that the court-martial is a court which sits to pass upon the most sacred questions of human rights that are ever placed on trial in a court of justice, and that it can not be conducted according to the will of any man, but must be conducted according to law.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The Supreme Court of the United States decided against the theory in the Runkle case, did it not?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, I think so. The Runkle case was decided in 1887, and Winthrop's first edition came out in 1886; so that it had not been decided when Winthrop's first edition came out. He did not change that point in his second edition. Up to the decision of the Grafton case in 1907 all military writers thought that the double jeopardy clause of the Constitution did not apply to the court-martial.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And it was made to apply by that decision?

Mr. MORGAN. By the Grafton decision.

Senator WARREN. You would have this appellate court send back on account of points of law or points of fact?

Mr. MORGAN. On points of law; but I consider it really a point of law where there is no evidence to justify the findings; do you not think that, Senator?

Senator WARREN. I wanted to get your view about it. We have had various opinions, usually along the line of sending cases back for errors of law alone. At the same time we have opinions on the other hand that they should have also the matter of judgment in the cases.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not agree with that. I think that the findings of this lower court should be treated as the findings of a lower court are treated by civilian appellate tribunals.

Senator WARREN. That is an error of law, where there is no evidence to sustain the conviction.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; that is an error of law. The case ought not to have gone to the jury. The court should have directed a verdict for the defendant.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The greatest fear of some of our military friends in regard to any modification of authority by the appellate tribunal is that it will interfere with the discipline of the commanding officer. I can not see that this proposal of yours would take the system out of the final control of the commanding officer.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not think it would, except on questions of law.

Senator WARREN. As I understand you, your court merely says, "Here, you have not tried this according to law; go back and try it again according to law."

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, exactly.

Senator WARREN. It does nothing on findings of fact.

Mr. MORGAN. No, unless the finding of fact is entirely unsupported by the evidence.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You know that in the English system—Col. Rigby went into that at great length—they have a civilian tribunal, which is the judge advocate, who is a civilian officer appointed for life or during good behavior, and his recommendations do not interfere with military control.

Mr. MORGAN. No.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. But the courts in trying these cases almost always follow his rulings.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, they practically do, and then there is an appeal from the general court-martial to the civil courts in England.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Has not the system become, in Great Britain, such that if the members of a court-martial disobey the rulings of these civilian authorities, they do it at their own risk?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes. It is rather dangerous to be a member of a court-martial in England on account of the fact that if the members act illegally in the trial of a case, they can be sued civilly for damages.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That has actually occurred?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, that has actually occurred. The famous case on that you will find cited in Mr. Garfield's argument in the case of Milligan, in 4th Wallace. The name of the officer who was tried was Lieut. Frye. He was tried by a naval court-martial and erroneously convicted. Afterwards he was sentenced to an excessive term of imprisonment. He had never served any part of the excess of the sentence. When he was brought back to England the errors were discovered. Thereafter he sued the president of the court-martial and recovered 1,000 pounds damages. The court informed Lieut. Frye that he had this same right of action not only against the president of the court, but against every member of it, and taking his cue from that he served summons on every one of the members of the court-martial. Some of these, Rear Admiral Mayne and Capt. Renton, were, at time of service, members of another naval court. This court passed a resolution censuring any civilian authorities, no matter how high they might be, for daring to interfere with the functions of a court-martial. That resolution went to the king, and he approved it. Mr. Chief Justice Willes ordered every one of the members of the court-martial arrested for contempt of court. After two or three months every member of the court-martial signed a most humble apology to the court for any reflection they might have cast upon the civil court and begged leave to withdraw the resolution. Chief Justice Willes, when the apology had been read in court, ordered it to be recorded in the remembrance office, so that it would be a warning that whosoever "think themselves above the law will in the end find themselves mistaken," and in England there are many more cases of damages against members of courts-martial than here.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The object of it was not to induce actions against members of courts-martial, but to make them careful.

Mr. MORGAN. To make them careful. The manual of military law in the English army prints an account of the Frye case that I have referred to, with comments, showing the attitude of the civil courts toward the military and warning the officers that they must be careful to keep within the law.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. On that I do not understand you that you wish to impose penalties as in England?

Mr. MORGAN. No. But I want to say this: I have yet to see the case where a judicial review would have interfered with the control of mere military discipline. There is a great deal of talk about its interfering with speedy trials and discipline; but, as a matter of fact, trials by court-martial are not particularly speedy. There is a provision of the seventieth article of war—which, by the way, I think ought to be changed—to the effect that the trial has to take place within 40 days after the arrest. That is the maximum limit applying to every place. Of course it is not observed.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It can not be.

Mr. MORGAN. It can not be observed.

Senator WARREN. I understand you have had this view in your mind while you were reviewing these cases, so that as you have passed from one case to another you have had it in your mind whether it would have interfered with military discipline or not?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir; and I think that the operation of General Orders 7 and 84 has shown very clearly that it has not interfered with the administration of discipline; that General Orders 7 and 84 worked so far as speed was concerned.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It has shown the absolute propriety of your contention?

Mr. MORGAN. I think so. That is my deduction from it.

Senator WARREN. That would naturally be the inference?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Have you anything else in mind?

Mr. MORGAN. I have not any other suggestions in mind, Senator. I think I have covered the main features of the bill and of the existing system.

Senator WARREN. Do you want to inquire any further, Senator?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I do not recall anything now that I care to ask. There is so much of it that we might go into, but I think you have covered it pretty generally.

Senator WARREN. I think the witness has covered quite well the points that we are particularly interested in.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I want to ask you this question. It might with propriety have been stated in the opening. You went to Yale University as a teacher of law?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And you practiced law before that?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, I practiced law in Minnesota for 8 years, and then taught law in Minnesota for 5 years.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. At what school?

Mr. MORGAN. At the University of Minnesota Law School.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And you were called from there to Yale?

Mr. MORGAN. I was called from there to Yale.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And you were at Yale when you went into this service in the War Department?

Mr. MORGAN. I had not yet reported for duty at Yale.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. At the completion of your service in the Judge Advocate General's office you went to Yale as professor of law?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; that is where I am now.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. As to the cases which you have cited here, I know that the chairman did not mean to suggest that they were rumors, but it might be inferred from the record that you were stating them as rumors. They were cases that came to your attention while you were chairman of the clemency board in the Judge Advocate General's office?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes. I can give you the file number of each one of them.

Senator WARREN. I was not thinking of that, at all.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I know you were not, but I was afraid that it might be so construed.

Senator WARREN. What I wanted to get at was exactly what Col. Morgan has testified to, his idea as to the changes in this law, and his reasons for it.

Mr. MORGAN. In order that there may be no misunderstanding, and in order that the specifications and basis of my criticism may be supported by specific instances, I offer as part of my testimony, and ask to have printed as such, a speech made by me before the Maryland Bar Association, at Atlantic City, N. J., on June 28, 1919:

(The speech referred to is here printed in full, as follows:)

MILITARY JUSTICE.

ADDRESS BY COL. EDMUND M. MORGAN, PROFESSOR OF LAW AT YALE UNIVERSITY, BEFORE THE MARYLAND STATE BAR ASSOCIATION, ATLANTIC CITY, N. J., JUNE 28, 1919.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the Maryland bar: The indictment which I bring against the existing system of so-called military justice, which Col. Wigmore seems to consider well-nigh perfect, contains the following counts: (1) That it is not only archaic but also anachronistic and un-American. (2) That as to substantive law, it provides for a government of men not of laws. (3) That as to procedure, it affords the accused no substantial protection. It grants him no statutory safeguard against trial upon unfounded charges; it does not guarantee him a fair or impartial trial; in fact, by furnishing a court, a prosecutor, and a defender, all untrained and incompetent, it makes a fair or impartial trial almost impossible; it permits a revision of findings of not guilty and a revision upwards of punishments; it requires no judicial regulation or supervision of the proceeding at any stage. (4) That its administration during this war has been as unreasonable, as unjust, and as un-American as the system itself.

The system is not only archaic but also anachronistic.

Our Articles of War came to us through the British Code of 1765. How we got our articles of 1776 is told in the autobiography of John Adams:

"Aug. 19, 1776. Mr. Adams and Mr. Jefferson were appointed a committee to hear Tudor and to revise the articles. It was a very difficult and unpopular subject. * * * There was extant one system of articles of war which had carried two empires to the head of command, the Roman and the British; for the British articles of war were only a literal translation of the Roman. It would be vain for us to seek in our own inventions, or the records of warlike nations, for a more complete system of military discipline. * * * I was therefore for reporting the British articles totidem verbis. (Jefferson agreed.) * * * The British articles were accordingly reported.

"Sept. 19, 1776.—This was another measure that I constantly urged on with all the zeal and industry possible, convinced that nothing short of the Roman and British discipline could possibly save us. * * * In Congress, Jefferson never spoke, and all the labor of the debate on those articles, paragraph by paragraph, was thrown upon me."

These articles were enacted, and, as Mr. Adams says, were in force in 1805, having survived the adoption of the Constitution. In 1806 they were reenacted without fundamental change. The so-called code of 1874, which was in force when Gen. Crowder first proposed his alleged revision of 1912-1916, is thus described by him:

"It is substantially the code of 1806, as 87 of the 101 articles which made up that code survive in the present articles unchanged, and a considerable number of the remaining articles survive without substantial change."

And a thorough examination of the present articles will demonstrate that they made not a single fundamental or systemic change in the code of 1874. To use Gen. Crowder's own words:

"As I have already pointed out, I hope the committee will give us a law sanctioning the meaning we have read into the old articles by construction alone. That is a real argument for this project of revision. I want to get off the uncertain ground where we have been for 106 years."

With reference to procedure, he said:

"If Congress enacts this revision the service will not be cognizant of any material changes in the procedure, and the courts will function much the same as heretofore."

These articles did make prosecutions before general courts easier, and thereby operated against rather than in favor of the accused. But the chief end accomplished by the Crowder revision was merely a rearrangement and a classification of existing statutes.

The fact, therefore, is that our Army—not only the small body of professional soldiers who make up the Regular Army, but the civilians, the citizens in uniform, who won this war and who must fight every war in which this Nation engages—is governed by a code, which, to use the language of Mr. Adams, "had carried two empires to the head of command," and which was designed to enforce "Roman discipline" and the discipline of the British armies of 1776.

And that means a discipline—a system—that reflects the relation of retainer and overlord. As you know, the Roman Republic began with a citizen army, but when after the overthrow of Carthage, Rome took on imperial ambition and magnitude, the Roman army, as Coulton says, "soon settled down into a regular type to which all professional armies tend to conform." Col. Fairbanks, one of Gen. Crowder's trusted assistants, puts it thus:

"The high officers spring from the aristocracy, the mass of the Army is voluntarily recruited and is kept together by the strictest discipline. Foreigners imported in large numbers formed separate units. This army, irresistible against Rome's enemies, in time proved equally dangerous to the State itself. * * * Soldiers lost all relation to civil life and recognized allegiance only to their commanders. As Coulton remarks, 'A nation in arms had formerly overthrown the kings; professional armies now overthrow the republic.'"

And Delbruck asserts that the nearest analogy to this world-conquering army of the Roman Republic is found in the English Army of the eighteenth century.

There you have it! Our army of citizens in uniform—our army of civilians protecting the Republic—subjected to a system of so-called military justice designed to fit an army of professional soldiers serving an empire for hire! Could there be a greater anachronism? Could anything be more un-American?

The existing system provides for a government, not of laws but of men. Many of the punitive articles do not define the offenses which they denounce. The fifty-eighth article does not define desertion, and the definition of that offense has been considerably broadened by interpretation during this war. The sixty-sixth article does not define mutiny. In the fall of 1917, 12 experienced noncommissioned officers were convicted of mutiny, because they did not obey an order to report for drill while in confinement under arrest. The circumstances of the case as disclosed by the record demonstrated beyond peradventure, that the men were not guilty of mutiny. But the conviction and sentence had been approved by the reviewing authority; and there was no method by which this conviction could be quashed. The only recourse for these men was through clemency, which connotes guilt. And the usual uncertainty of the specific punitive articles is made more uncertain by the so-called general article, which denounces "all disorders and neglects to the prejudice of good order and military discipline, and all conduct of a nature to bring discredit upon the military service." What constitutes such disorder, neglect, or misconduct depends upon the commanding officer, the court, or the reviewing authority, as the case may be. What one officer may consider an offense another may entirely overlook. What a particular officer may deem a violation of this article if done on Monday, he may regard as immaterial if committed on Tuesday. There is no legal test, and no legal method of enforcing any alleged or supposed test.

With the exceptions that certain corporal punishment is forbidden, that the death penalty may be inflicted only where expressly authorized, and that a penitentiary may be designated as the place of imprisonment only for certain military offenses and for civil offenses where the authorized and imposed period of confinement exceeds one year, the punishment is entirely in the discretion of the court and the reviewing authorities. The penalties imposed for the same offense exhibit the widest variance. Courts have during this war imposed for absence without leave penalties varying from 3 months to 99 years; for disobedience of orders, from a few months imprisonment to the death penalty. The present Acting Judge Advocate General himself told me of two cases wherein the accused were charged with using contemptuous words against the President. Soldier A used the words and was tried in England; Soldier B used practically the same words and was tried in France. Soldier A was sentenced to three months' confinement. Soldier B was sentenced to 25 years. "And," said the Acting Judge Advocate General to me, "all I could do in each case was to say, 'The evidence justifies the finding, the sentence is authorized by law.'"

As to procedure, the present system affords the accused no substantial protection. First, It grants him no statutory safeguard against trial upon unfounded charges. It is true that the Manual for Court-Martial provides for a preliminary investigation before charges are preferred. And it has been asserted that few, if any, innocent men are brought to trial, because the preliminary investigation is thorough and because only serious offenses are prosecuted. Nothing could be further from the truth. The preliminary investigations are made in the most slipshod manner by men untrained and inexperienced in the investigation of facts. To substantiate this statement I need go no further than to say that under date of April 4, 1919, the Judge Advocate General's Office sent to the Secretary of War certain proposals for the "Modification of Rules of Procedure in the Administration of Military Justice," designed among other things—

"(a) To require an officer preferring a charge to transmit therewith over his signature a brief but comprehensive summary of the evidence upon which he bases the charge.

"(b) To insure careful preliminary investigation of charges before reference for trial to the end that only such charges as are properly referable for trial to be so referred.

"(c) To lay down with greater particularity the duties and responsibilities of investigating officers and staff judge advocates, with a view to guarding against the possibility of (1) hasty or ill-considered action by any officer exercising court-martial jurisdiction, (2) ordering any person to trial before a general court-martial without full and careful as well as impartial investigation of the case and unless a reasonable probability of the guilt of the accused has been made to appear, or (3) trivial charges being referred to a general court-martial."

It is well that number (3) was mentioned and time that the chief law officer of the War Department should recognize the absurdity of some of the prosecutions. For example, in case 101776 a soldier was brought to trial before a general court-martial for stealing two cans of condensed milk—the alleged value, 14 cents—for which he was sentenced to three months' confinement. In case 121141 a soldier in sick quarters took $3.10 out of the pocket of a pair of trousers hanging up on the wall. He went out of the room, became conscience-stricken and within a few minutes replaced the money. He was tried for larceny of the money, found guilty and sentenced to dishonorable discharge and one year's confinement. But, be it remembered, that the Judge Advocate General is proposing that these safeguards be thrown around the accused, not by statute but by a general order, a general order which may be revoked by the same authority that makes it. This would be a protection that would protect only so long and in such cases as the War Department desired. The evil is recognized, but the remedy proposed is inadequate.

Second, It does not guarantee him a fair or impartial trial; in fact, by furnishing a court, a prosecutor and a defender, all untrained and incompetent, it makes a fair or impartial trial almost impossible.

This is a strong statement, but I make it advisedly, knowing that it is supported by the facts. In the first place, when we speak of a court-martial, we must rid our minds of our ordinary conception of a court. While a court-martial performs the functions of a court, and, as the United States Supreme Court said in the Runkle case, is a court which "sits to pass upon the most sacred questions of human rights that are ever placed on trial in a court of justice," yet it is entirely unlike our common-law court. It is more like a mere investigating committee. The general court consists of from five to 13 officers detailed usually from the line of the Army. They need not be learned in the law, and usually have no more knowledge thereof than they get from the Courts-Martial Manual. They ordinarily have no person of legal learning to guide them either in their investigation or in their deliberations. The trial of cases is with them a side issue. It is a disagreeable burden imposed upon them in addition to their normal duties, and is to be discharged with as much expedition as possible. These officers hear the evidence presented, rule upon questions of fact and law arising during the trial, and make findings and impose sentences. No one could expect these line officers, unguided by any person similar to a judge in the civil courts, to conduct trials according to law. And if one may rely upon the records, any one so expecting would be doomed to disappointment. I could cite to you numerous examples, but the following will suffice.

Case ———: The accused was on trial for murder. His plea was self-defense. The theory of the prosecution was that he had stabbed the decedent from behind while decedent was peacefully eating his breakfast. The theory of the defense was that the decedent had badly beaten the accused on the previous evening, that as accused was passing behind decedent with a bread knife in his hand decedent rose from the table and made a threatening movement toward the accused, and that accused, believing decedent to be armed and fearing injury, stabbed and killed decedent. The first witness for the prosecution described the stabbing. Upon cross-examination, counsel for accused asked the witness leading questions tending to show that the witness had paid very slight attention to the encounter. He was successfully attaining his object when the president of the court interrupted with: "Stop asking him leading questions." "But I have the right to ask him leading questions on cross-examination." "Yes, but you have no right to put the answer into his mouth. You are making this witness say whatever you want him to say." The president of the court was a fierce-looking colonel. Counsel for accused was a youngster. The record shows that he did no effective cross-examining thereafter.

Case ———: The defense of accused was an alibi. Accused offered two witnesses besides himself. Each of the witnesses was interrupted by the president of the court, warning him that he was under oath and explaining the offense of perjury. The accused was likewise interrupted in his testimony, and advised that perjury was a more serious offense than that for which he was on trial. Counsel for accused was reprimanded and threatened with disciplinary proceedings if he did not desist from asking leading questions, while the prosecutor was permitted to ask leading questions freely.

Case 119773: The following is a review by a special branch of the special clemency board in a case where the accused had been found guilty and sentenced to 15 years in confinement.

"The case was poorly tried in that (a) irrelevant testimony of a character to create bias against the accused was received over objection; (b) incompetent evidence of like character was also admitted; (c) counsel for the accused was checked by the court in his perfectly proper objections and motions; (d) proper and justified request for continuance to secure witnesses was denied; (e) improper argument by the judge advocate.

"The trial was irregular, unfair, arbitrary, and ridiculous."

Case 113212: Accused was charged with desertion. The prosecution rested after merely reading the charge and specification. The accused made an unsworn statement denying that he had any intent to desert the service. The court, after inquiring whether the prosecution had no more evidence, was closed. Later it reopened, and announced: "The court finds there is insufficient evidence to justify a finding of guilty or acquittal, and instructs the judge advocate and counsel for defense to ask a continuance." Imagine a real court requiring evidence from the accused where there was no evidence by the prosecution. When the court met again it convicted the accused.

The foregoing cases illustrate as well the ignorance of the prosecutor or trial judge advocate, who also is usually an officer detailed from the line. He is not required to have, and very rarely does he have, any legal training. He is expected, so far as he is able to do so, to act as legal adviser to the court, and in theory he is to see to it that the rights of the accused are not violated. In practice, the best that can be said of him is that he usually has higher rank and less unfamiliarity with the law and procedure than has counsel for the accused.

In a large percentage of the cases the accused would be better off without counsel than with the counsel assigned. The records show an almost unbelievable ignorance or disregard of the rights of the accused by his counsel. I have seen record after record, where had counsel not put on any witnesses accused must have been acquitted. Indeed, judge advocates who review records know that it is a common experience for accused's own counsel to be responsible for accused's conviction. And it is not a matter for astonishment when it is remembered that counsel is usually assigned, that he is ordinarily a comparatively young and inexperienced line officer, that this work is in addition to his regular duties and that he gets practically no credit for it. The records show that in less than 2 per cent of the cases counsel is a civilian; in about 3 per cent he is a chaplain; and in over 77 per cent he is an officer of the rank of lieutenant. These facts may explain cases like the following, but they can neither excuse nor justify them.

Case 117174: A soldier was on trial for desertion. The only action at the trial by counsel is indicated by his statement, as follows: "In view of the fact that I have had no opportunity to investigate the charges against the prisoner, I would like for the court to let him go on the stand and make an unsworn statement in his own behalf." Now, desertion in time of war is a capital offense. This soldier was on trial for his life. Think of counsel entering a trial of such seriousness without preparation! The accused was found guilty and sentenced to imprisonment for 20 years. And the startling truth—the all-important fact, which was not brought out at the trial and which would have been decisive proof of innocence—is that the accused was an imbecile!

Case 118220: Accused was tried for desertion. All evidence except that of mere absence without leave was hearsay and inadmissible by the most well-established rules of law. Conviction and sentence to 25 years' imprisonment followed. Accused was mentally defective. A branch of the special clemency board, headed by a former judge of a State supreme court, reviewed the record and said: "The findings are not sustained by competent evidence. The record is a discredit to military justice."

Case 121043: Accused was tried for disobeying an order of a military policeman and for striking him in the face. He was found guilty and sentenced by the court to 20 years' imprisonment, which the reviewing authority reduced to 10 years. Here also the accused was an imbecile—a fact not suggested at the trial.

Case 123826: Accused was absent without leave from September 3, 1918, to October 15, 1918. He went home to see his sick mother, who died while he was there. On his way back to camp he stopped to visit his aunt, where he was apprehended. He was tried and found guilty of desertion and sentenced to 10 years' imprisonment. No mental defect was suggested at the trial. In fact, accused was an imbecile, having the mental development of a four-year-old child.

Case 119330: Accused was on trial for desertion. He was defended by a chaplain who evidently was of the opinion that accused was mentally unbalanced. His speech of defense for the accused was a simple statement that he did not think accused was mentally responsible, but that he did not believe in sending men before "nut boards" (boards of psychiatry), for such mentally irresponsible soldiers "should either be emasculated or sent to Leavenworth." The accused was found guilty and sentenced to 10 years' imprisonment. Imagine counsel in a capital case so cavalierly denying the right of his client to interpose the defense of mental irresponsibility.

The officers constituting the special clemency board, reviewing the records of trial of men in confinement, found over half the cases poorly tried. And some cases which they described as well tried were so bad as to be almost ridiculous. The plain, simple fact is that the average court-martial trial would be a comedy, were it not fraught with such tragic results for the accused.

Third. Under the present system, the officer who appointed the court and to whom the court must transmit its findings and sentence, may return for reconsideration and revision findings of not guilty or sentences which he deems too light.

The court, on reconsideration, is not obliged to change its finding or to increase its sentence; but an examination of cases chosen by Gen. Crowder at random shows that in one-third of the cases sent back for revision it did change its finding of not guilty to a finding of guilty, and that in a great majority of cases so returned, it increased the punishment to conform with the recommendation of the reviewing authority. Gen. Crowder has said that he knows of no cases where injustice was worked by such revised findings or sentences. If so, it is because he is so blind that he won't see. He need look only at the following cases, which are not exceptional:

Case No. 110526: The accused was charged with murder. The court found him guilty of manslaughter and sentenced him to 10 years' confinement. The revising authority sent the case back with a sharp indorsement to the effect that accused should have been found guilty of murder. On reconvention the court so found, and sentenced him to life imprisonment. The special clemency board found the first action of the court proper, and reduced the sentence to eight years.

Case 116691: The accused was found guilty of absence without leave and sentenced to confinement for one year and forfeiture of two-thirds of pay for a like period. The reviewing authority sent the case back for revision with an improper statement as to the effect of the evidence. The court reconvened, found accused guilty of desertion, and sentenced him to 10 years' imprisonment and dishonorable discharge.

Case 121081: Accused was charged with escape and desertion. He was found guilty of escape and not guilty of desertion and sentenced to two years' imprisonment. The reviewing authority sent the case back with an argument in favor of a finding of guilty of desertion. The court reconvened, found accused guilty of desertion, and sentenced him to 20 years' imprisonment.

In the three foregoing cases the special clemency board recommended modification of the sentences on the ground that the original finding of the court was in each case the proper finding.

Fourth. There is no judicial supervision of the proceeding at any stage.

I know this statement will be challenged, and the review of the record by the division judge advocate will be cited, and the elaborate machinery of the office of the Judge Advocate General will be described. But the division judge advocate is not a judicial officer, and furthermore he has no power of supervision. It is frequently upon his advice that the accused is prosecuted; frequently, if not usually, he directs and aids the trial judge advocate with counsel as to how to proceed, what witnesses to call, etc., and he is in no position to act judicially. As for the Judge Advocate General, he has himself decided that he has no power to review or revise. He can merely advise the Secretary of War or the President. And in the vast majority of cases the findings and sentences are final and beyond all power save that of clemency when the record reaches the Office of the Judge Advocate General. Indeed, the only cases where legally the Judge Advocate General may act before the finding and sentence becomes final are those which require confirmation by the President, namely, certain death sentences and certain sentences of dismissal of an officer. In these cases the Judge Advocate General may advise the President. As a matter of fact, however, such advice is transmitted through the Chief of Staff and Secretary of War, who may urge the President to disregard the advice. And the President has the power to disregard it.

By an extra legal order, known as General Order No. 7, War Department, 1918, reviewing authorities are required to submit to the Judge Advocate General, before executing sentence, for advice as to the legality of the finding and sentence, cases where certain punishments are proposed to be inflicted. The real power of the Judge Advocate General under this order was tested by the now famous Tapolina case, which is discussed on pages 9 and 10 of the pamphlet written by Col. Wigmore, for Gen. Crowder, entitled "Military Justice During the War."

Tapolina was a military policeman. He was charged with burglary. His story was that he had heard the sound of breaking glass near the building in question, that he investigated, saw a broken window, heard someone moving about inside, entered, and while searching for the supposed intruders, was himself arrested by two other military policemen. The court believed his story and found him not guilty. When the finding was transmitted to the reviewing authority, who was the commanding officer convening the court, he returned the record and findings with a direction that the court reconvene for revision and reconsideration of the findings. The entire indorsement returning the record was merely an argument to show that the evidence warranted a finding of guilty. The court on reconvention found the accused guilty and sentenced him to imprisonment for five years. Since the case involved dishonorable discharge, which was not to be suspended, it came to the Judge Advocate General's office for a review as to its legality, and the officer reviewing the case in the Office of the Judge Advocate General, in paragraph 18 of his review, said:

"After a careful consideration of the evidence this office is firmly convinced of the absolute innocence of the accused. The evidence against him is wholly inconclusive and his own statements have a ring of sincerity which convinces the reader that he speaks the truth."

The review of the case containing the above quoted paragraph was sent to the commanding officer, with the statement:

"At this stage of this case the matter of the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain a conviction is within the discretion of the reviewing authority, the court having already passed thereon. However, since, in examining the case to its legality, one of the assistants in this office has made a study of the sufficiency of the evidence, it is deemed to be within the sphere of propriety to say that this office entertains grave doubts as to whether the guilt of the accused is established by the evidence. This doubt seems to have been shared by the court in its first finding and acquittal. The guilt of the accused must, of course, be established beyond a reasonable doubt. In order that the reviewing authority may have the benefit of the study referred to, a copy thereof is inclosed herewith for such consideration as he may deem advisable to give it."

The commanding officer, notwithstanding the review of the Judge Advocate General, affirmed the sentence and designated the penitentiary as the place of confinement. This he did upon the advice of his division judge advocate, who was a Regular Army officer, an officer who had been in the line from the Spanish-American War up to the time of the present emergency, and was commissioned in the Judge Advocate General's Department during the emergency. Compare these facts with the statements of the same case on pages 9 and 10 of the pamphlet above referred to, and then ask yourself whether that pamphlet was written for the purpose of putting the facts fairly before the people. Then consider also the following: Under date of February 13, the substance of the statement of this case, as printed on pages 9 and 10 of that pamphlet, was written in a letter to the Secretary of War and signed by Gen. Crowder, for the purpose of having the Secretary transmit it to Congress. Under date of February 12 the same Judge Advocate General who signed this communication to the Secretary of War, for the purpose of assuring Congress that this man, Tapolina, had been properly convicted and all his legal rights properly cared for, signed an indorsement to The Adjutant General with reference to this same case, which contained the following: "While it can not be said that there is no evidence upon which the finding of guilty can be based, this office is strongly of the opinion that an injustice may have been done to this man, and that it should be righted as far as possible. It will be noted that Mr. Flager, field director of the Red Cross at Camp Gordon, comments upon the poor reputation of one of the principal witnesses against Tapolina. It is recommended that the unexecuted portion of the sentence in this case be remitted, and that the prisoner be released from confinement and restored to duty upon his written application to that end."

This case demonstrates two things: (1) The absolute impotence of the Judge Advocate General's Office with respect to the review or supervision of trials by court-martial; (2) the readiness of the Judge Advocate General, as a constituent part of the War Department, to uphold action taken by reviewing authorities to the prejudice of the accused, even where that action was taken in direct disregard of the opinion of the Judge Advocate General.

There is then no judicial supervision of a court-martial proceeding. There is no legal method of righting the outrageous injustices done by ignorant courts, prosecutors, and counsel. In short the present procedure affords the accused no substantial protection when he is charged with an offense. All the machinery for review (with a view to supervision) in the office of the Judge Advocate General is extra legal. Most of it was devised by Gen. Ansell, and has been in operation only since the spring of 1918. It is being continued by Gen. Kreger. It may be abolished at any moment by Gen. Crowder or his successor.

The administration of military justice during this war has been as unreasonable, as unjust, and as un-American as the system itself.

The American theory is, that an accused shall be presumed innocent until he is proved guilty. That theory is supposed to obtain in courts-martial practice. In fact just the opposite is true. The average court-martial challenges a man to prove himself innocent. The language used by the reviewing authorities in sending findings of not guilty back for revision illustrate this attitude, e. g., "it is thought that there is sufficient evidence to find him guilty as charged." (Case 112382.) "The evidence is sufficient to establish desertion." (Case 121081.) "The evidence is sufficient to support a finding of attempt to escape." (Case 125028.) It is also most amply demonstrated by the records, which show that during this war about 88 per cent of the trials have resulted in convictions and that during the peace-time régime about 96 per cent of the trials resulted in convictions. These figures would not be quite so startling were the facts what some persons would have us believe, namely, that there are comparatively few trials in the Army as contrasted with the civil community. But such is not the fact. Let it be remembered that no considerable body of troops reached camp before November, 1917; that at no time did we actually have forces in appreciable excess of 4,000,000 men, and that of these 4,000,000, a considerable percentage was in camp but a few months; and it will be clear that a fair average for the war period would be between two and three millions. Then consider Secretary Baker's statement to Congress that up to February 1, 1919, there had been more than 22,000 trials by general courts-martial and 350,000 trials by inferior courts. And Mr. Baker was speaking only of records which had been reported to the War Department. A conservative estimate of the number of trials to date would exceed 400,000. Think of it, from 10 to 20 per cent of the members of our forces brought to trial on criminal charges, and 88 per cent of those tried convicted. What civil community will show so damning a record?

The cases already cited illustrate the harshness of the sentences imposed. In almost all of the cases examined by the special clemency board the sentences were absurdly severe. This board recommended reducing the sentences by more than 77 per cent and remitting a total of over 18,000 years. Think of a court sentencing a boy of 17 to be dishonorably discharged and to be imprisoned for 2½ years for stealing a shirt of the value of $2.38, and another court sentencing another 17-year-old boy to dishonorable discharge and 3 years' imprisonment for stealing a shirt and a pair of shoes of the total value of $5.19. If this does not arouse you, contemplate case No. 123180, in which the accused first committed the heinous offense of refusing to take off a bow tie when ordered to do so by a sergeant, and when put in arrest for this awful crime he went further and told the sergeant he would kill him if he got a chance. Upon conviction the court sentenced him to dishonorable discharge and 25 years' imprisonment. The reviewing authority reduced the sentence to 10 years. What a travesty upon common sense.

It has been attempted to explain these results as due to the new and inexperienced officers. I resent this, and assert the contrary. The indubitable facts are that the reviewing authority has the power to reduce a sentence before approving it, and that in almost every instance the reviewing authority was a Regular Army officer. Furthermore, usually a regular officer dominated the court. And, finally, so far as convictions are concerned, the percentage of convictions when the system was administered solely by regulars was 96; after the advent of the temporary officers was 88.

And woe be to him in the service who dared oppose this sacrosanct system. Everybody knows what has happened to Ansell. But not everybody knows what happened to others not so exalted in rank. Many a young officer, attempting to protect the rights of the accused has been threatened with court-martial proceedings himself. (See case 126312, Corporal S. F. Morton.) Capt. Francis M. Doyle learned what opposition to the system means. He was appointed to defend a boy before a special court-martial, composed of three officers who he deemed "unfitted to act in a judicial capacity" and one of whom was "notorious for his abuse of men." In order to protect his client he demanded that a stenographic report of the trial be taken. The commanding officer at Columbus barracks refused his request. He then appealed directly to the commanding officer of the central department, respectfully stating his objections to the court and demanding "an unbiased court-martial." For this he was himself tried by general court-martial.

There is no question that the system is bad and that its administration has been bad. There is no question that the War Department will resist, in fact, is resisting, any attempt to reform it fundamentally. The Ansell bill, which has been introduced into the Senate by Senator Chamberlain and in the House by Congressman Royal Johnson, and which is supported by all the Members of Congress who have seen service, the War Department is trying to kill in committee. It will offer all sorts of substitutes by way of regulation and reform from within. It will predict Bolshevism and the destruction of discipline. It will even go so far as to say that the object of the military system is the attainment of victory through arms and not the doing of justice to individual soldiers, as if the two were inconsistent. But I challenge the supporters of the present system to produce a single specific case wherein the granting of a fair and impartial trial under a judicial supervision, in the stead of the travesty upon justice actually granted, would have injured discipline or morale one whit. I do not discount the importance or the necessity of maintaining discipline, but I assert that when a commanding officer decides that a person subject to military law is to be tried to determine whether he has violated any civil or military law or regulation, the accused is entitled to a fair and impartial trial; that none of the demands of discipline require that he be deprived of the safeguards provided for an accused by the Constitution; that provision should be made for conducting the trial according to law; and that the question whether the accused has been given a fair and impartial trial is one of law, which should be decided by a judicial tribunal and not by a military officer claiming to act by right of command and without respect to or regard for law.

Senator WARREN. Now, Colonel, unless you have something further you wish to offer, we shall excuse you. We are very glad you came, and we feel under obligations to you.

(Thereupon, at 12:20 o'clock, p. m. the subcommittee adjourned, subject to the call of the chairman.)
